Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to offer some papers?

Mr. STEWART. In connection with the pending matter?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. STEWART. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. MORGAN. I have here an extract from the works of Mr. Calvo on Costa Rica, and a communication from Mr. Corea, the minister of Nicaragua, on subjects relating to this debate, which I ask to have read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

COSTA RICA.

Religion.—There was a concordat between Costa Rica and the Holy See, but the same was declared inconvenient for the nation and denounced in 1885.

The great majority of Costa Ricans being of Catholic faith, the Government protects that religion and contributes to its support with sums from the national treasury.

The constitution only establishes tolerance of other religions, but deep in the hearts of all Costa Ricans are implanted the principles of liberty in matters of conscience, in which each one should be guided by his own idea of right.

Religious freedom advanced considerably from the year 1842, not only as to laws, but as to tolerance in all classes of people. In that year cemeteries were provided for non-Catholics, and in 1847 a Protestant congregation was in existence. The present tolerance for other beliefs is obvious in the fact that the first church built in Central America, consecrated to a religion different from that of the country, stands to-day in San Jose, Costa Rica, no more than 125 yards from the great Catholic cathedral.

Public instruction.—The constitution provides that elementary instruction of both sexes is obligatory, free, and provided for by the Government. The immediate supervision shall be for the municipality, the supreme inspection for the executive.

Every Costa Rican or foreigner is free to give or receive instruction in institutions which are not maintained at public expense.

The instruction given at public schools is laic.

The efforts have been great and sustained to advance education, and it is to be remarked that all those in office, through the different administrations that have come one after another, have constantly shown the greatest and most laudable interest in the matter, and always maintaining a system in harmony with modern ideas.

Laws.—Costa Rica was the first of the Central American Republics to effect complete emancipation from the Spanish and colonial laws and one of the first countries of Latin America to provide herself with laws in harmony with new mode of political being and with the progress of civilization.

In the penal code, in effect since 1880, the death penalty is abolished, as well as other humiliating and cruel punishments, and in 1886 there was promulgated a new civil code, in which are prominent the civil marriage, divorce, and civil liberty of woman.

Matrimony is perpetual, and has for its objects procreation and mutual support. It corresponds to the civil authority alone to act and decide on any demands relative to divorce and separation, as well as nullity or any other question relative to matrimony.

The rights of faith and property are strictly observed and have never been infringed upon in Costa Rica, nor have retroactive laws been framed.

The sacredness of correspondence, the right to meet in bodies and and to petition, the right of habeas corpus, the liberty of the press, all are guaranteed by the constitution.

Foreigners enjoy every civil right without being admitted to citizenship or being compelled to contribute heavy sums. Admission to citizenship may be applied at any time and will be granted on same principles as in most civilized countries, after one year's residence. Settlers are not obliged to become naturalized citizens nor to pay forced contributions. They can carry on business and manufacture, possess real estate, buy and sell, navigate the rivers and coasts, and, subject to the laws, may exercise freely their religious creeds, marry, and dispose of their property by will.

Facts.—Costa Rica has always been distinguished by her strenuous efforts in the pursuits toward modern progress and by the unity of race and love of peace and labor which are characteristic traits of her patriotic children.

As a natural cause of all what precedes, it is a fact, well known, that Costa Rica has not to-day, nor ever had at any time, claims presented to her for damages or injuries caused by arbitrary acts or measures on the part of her judicial or military authorities against the citizens of other nations. Far from it, she opens her gates to them and freely gives them full liberty to enjoy and secure for themselves the treasures of her soil. (From J. B. Calvo's works on Costa Rica.)

LEGACIÓN DE NICARAGUA,
Washington, D. C., June 17, 1902.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR MORGAN: I have just received your letter of the 16th instant in which you ask me for an official statement concerning the truth of the assertion "that the Government of Nicaragua has been making sales or grants of public lands within a zone of 6 miles—3 miles of the center line of the canal route located by the Isthmian Canal Commission—and that such lands have been so disposed of since the date of the agreement between Nicaragua and the United States, dated December 1, 1900."

In answer I may say that there is no foundation in truth for such an assertion. Under the agrarian laws of Nicaragua the Government to dispose of public lands must first issue a decree, and the only decree issued by President Zelaya after December 1, 1900, is the one dated September 27, 1901, a copy of which I inclose. This, no doubt, is the one that has been misquoted, because it mentions the Atlantic coast.

In article 5 of this same decree you will see that the officers who are affected by it are the governor of Bluefields, capital of the department of Zelaya, otherwise known in time past as the Mosquito Territory, and the governor of the Comarca of Cabo de Gracias á Dios, which lies along the extreme northeastern coast of Nicaragua and north of the department of Zelaya.

The proposed route of the canal runs through the Comarca of San Juan del Norte and the department of Chontales on the Atlantic side and the department of Rivas on the Pacific side. The shortest distance between any point along the proposed route and any point within the department of Zelaya, which lies closest, is 40 to 50 miles.

Therefore no decree has been issued by President Zelaya since December 1, 1900, affecting the public lands within the 6-mile zone, and consequently no land has been sold or granted by the Government within the said zone.

You are at liberty, as you request, to make such public use of this information as you may deem proper.

I have the honor to remain, with sincere respect, yours, etc.,

LUIS F. COREA.

Mr. MORGAN. There is also a translation taken from the Diario Oficial, Managua, which I ask to have printed without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

The paper referred to is as follows:

[Translation. Taken from the Diario Oficial, Managua, September 27, 1901. Department of finance and public credit.]

The President of the Republic, considering that in the tract of lands which are not denounceable in the Atlantic litoral there exist numerous farmed lands which the Government is in duty bound to advance and protect for the security of landed property and to facilitate the acquisition of the right of possession of these lots of land, in conformity with the decree of July 6, 1899, resolves:

ARTICLE 1. To allow the actual possessors of public lands in the tract which has not been denounced in the eastern coast of the Republic to acquire the right of property of the lots which they may have cultivated or marked off.

ART. 2. The petition shall be filed before the governors of Bluefields or of Cabo de Gracias á Dios, according to the jurisdiction in which the land may be located, within precisely three months from the date of the publication of the present resolution; the petitioner being obliged to express in his petition the boundaries, the kind of agricultural pursuits in which he has engaged, and the number of manzanas cultivated.

ART. 3. The officials referred to will secure information from two suitable witnesses to prove whether the land has really been cultivated or marked off, and when this information is complete they will order it to be published by proclamations, inserting one in the newspaper of Bluefields. In case that there has been no opposition, after twenty days have elapsed they will award the land to the party interested, who must previously deposit its value in the corresponding subtreasury within the eight following days, complying with everything else relating to the agrarian law in force until they obtained the grant of the title.

ART. 4. After the term referred to in article 2 has elapsed, or the eight days to which the foregoing article makes reference, and the deposit has not been made, the possessors will be considered as lessees, and will pay annually in advance the rent hereinafter expressed.

ART. 5. The governors of Bluefields and of Cabo de Gracias shall appoint engineers who will form the registry of the survey of lands, which in future may be possessed by lease according to this enactment; the expense of measurement and marking off of each lot being payable by the interested parties.

ART. 6. While the measure is being made said officials shall procure information, by means of witnesses, to ascertain which lots of cultivated or marked off land have not been procured by right or title according to article 2, and the approximate extent of each one of them. Having obtained full information in regard to this matter they shall notify the possessors that they are considered as lessees, cautioning them in the same act that they have to deposit the value of their lease within fifteen days.

When a possessor of public lands be considered as lessee because he has not paid the deposit within eight days referred to in article 3, the term for the payment of the lease will be reckoned from the following day after the expiration of the eight days.

ART. 7. If after the measure has been made it is ascertained that the number of manzanas is in excess of that which has served as base to fix the rent, the parties interested shall pay the difference in the corresponding subtreasury; and in case of excess it shall be discounted in the following payments.

ART. 8. If, after the possessors have been notified that they are lessees, any one of them contends right of property or any other real right to the land and appeals or brings up opposition without presenting a title in due form and registered, he is obliged to accompany a certification of the deposit of the value of the rent to get a hearing.

ART. 9. The price of each manzana will be the following:

If it is suitable for breeding live stock	$5.00
If it is suitable for agriculture	8.00
If for agriculture besides being comprised in a zone of 2,000 varas broad along the margins of navigable rivers for large vessels	10.00

For each manzana of irrigable land $2 in excess will be paid.

ART. 10. The value of the lease will be:

For each manzana of land suitable for grazing live stock	1.50
For each manzana of land suitable for raising live stock or for agriculture	2.50
For each manzana of land suitable for raising live stock, if it is comprised in a zone of 2,000 varas broad along the margins of navigable rivers for large vessels	3.00

ART. 11. The governors of Bluefields and of Cabo de Gracias á Dios will notify at once the department of finance each time that a petition is filed before them, according to article 2, and of the acts they may issue considering as lessees the actual possessors of land, according to article 6, expressing in either case the limits, the kind of agricultural pursuit, and the number of manzanas of the lot.

Be it communicated. Managua, September 20, 1901. Zelaya. The minister of finance—Zelaya, R.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the climate of Panama is practically prohibitory of a canal at that locality if any regard is to be paid to human life. I have heard it asserted in this debate that the climate of Panama is as good as that of Nicaragua. Of course those who have made that assertion are ignorant of the facts. Climates in the Tropics are comparatively healthful where they have a sea breeze. Some of the tropical islands are as healthful as any part of the world; but in places in the Tropics where there is no wind there must be disease.

The doldrums of Panama Bay are known to all navigators. I myself saw in the winter of 1849–50 vessels lying in Panama Bay which had been there for months. After my arrival in California I met persons who left New York and sailed around the Horn and arrived there before the passengers in the ships I left at Panama reached San Francisco. Vessels were frequently compelled to remain at Panama for six or eight months at a time before they could sail away. That bay is so situated that during certain seasons of the year they have no winds. Besides, vessels are compelled to sail as much as a thousand or fifteen hundred miles before they can get out of the bay and strike the trade winds to enable them to go either north or south.

It is only during the few months of the year that a favorable breeze prevails. During the rest of the time there is no breeze in Panama and no wind at all. Sometimes they have tremendous rains there, but it is during only certain seasons of the year that they have any breeze whatever.

I knew something about Panama before the railroad was built. I crossed the Isthmus first in 1849. I went up the Chagres River in a canoe, and I have seen that river a good many times. The chief surgeon of the company which built the Panama Railroad was a friend of mine, an old schoolmate, by the name of Stephen Rogers. My friend Rogers was chief surgeon during the whole construction of the road. Of the first party of men who went down there from New York he told me not one was able to do two weeks' work.

A very large number died, and the balance were taken back to New York. The company then got Chinamen, thinking they could stand any climate. The Chinamen died almost as rapidly as the white people. It was perfectly shocking to hear of the number of Chinamen who died there, according to his account. The company then took natives of the Isthmus and tried to get them to work, but they could not stand digging up the soil. They were poisoned by it and had to quit, and the railroad company was almost in despair.

Then they tried negroes from Jamaica, who were in the habit of working in tropical soil, and they served pretty well. They built the railroad. I saw them upon the Isthmus after the road was built. They were great big, fine fellows physically. They did pretty much all of the work that has been done on the Panama Railroad and on the Panama Canal. White men can not live and work there. Any man living there has death staring him in the face all the time, and the reason why it is worse at Panama than in any other tropical place on earth is because there is less wind there during a long season of the year. There is nothing to carry away the malaria. There is nothing to give the inhabitants fresh air. The most dismal place on earth is Panama during the six or eight months when there is no wind blowing. I verily believe we will sacrifice more lives than the canal is worth if we build the canal at Panama.

After I came into the Senate, Senator Conness, of California, offered a resolution, directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish a report of surveys across the Isthmus. In response to this demand, Rear-Admiral C. H. Davis reported, in July, 1866:

There does not exist in the libraries of the world the means of determining, even approximately, the most practicable route for a ship canal across the Isthmus.

That was the short report he made.

Nothing further was done in the matter until General Grant was elected President, and called Commodore Ammen to Washington and placed him at the head of the Bureau of Navigation.

I recollect that circumstance very well. President Grant sent for Mr. Conness and myself, who were interested in it before he did this, and discussed the matter. He was very much interested. He had been over the Isthmus.

Congress had voted the money for the surveys and a commission was appointed in 1872 to report upon the several results of the different expeditions that had already been or were to be sent out at the expense of the Government.

Previous to the election of President Grant there had been sporadic examinations under governmental authority of different routes extending over a period of many years.

The following is a list of the canal lines and of the work done upon them by the American naval officers:

1. Capt. R. W. Shufeldt made an instrumental reconnoissance of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec in 1872.

2. Commander Chester Hatfield, in 1872, and Commander E. P. Lull, in 1872 and 1873, made an examination, survey, and definite instrumental location of an interoceanic canal from the vicinity of Greytown, or San Juan del Nicaragua, via Lake Nicaragua, and thence via the Rio del Medio and Rio Grande to Brito.

3. Commander E. P. Lull made an examination, survey, and definite instrumental location for a canal from Navy Bay to Panama in 1875.

4. Commander T. O. Selfridge in 1870 examined and surveyed a route from the Gulf of San Blas toward the river Chepo; and Commander E. P. Lull in 1875 made further reconnoissances from the waters of the Chepo toward the Gulf of San Blas.

5. Commander T. O. Selfridge in 1871 drew several tentative lines from Caledonia Bay to the waters of the Secubti and Morti, which are tributaries to the Chucunaque.

6. Commander Selfridge examined the Du Puydt line between Tuyra and Atrato via the Tanela River.

7. Commander Selfridge examined the Gogorza route via Atrato, Cacarica, Tuyra, and Cue rivers in 1871.

8. Lieut. Frederick Collins in 1875 examined and located a route by way of the Napipi and Doguado rivers.

Besides the above there was—

9. An inspection of the Nicaragua and Atrato routes, made in 1874 at the request of the Secretary of Navy, by Maj. W. McFarland and Capt. W. H. Heuer, both of the United States Corps of Engineers; Prof. H. Mitchell, United States Coast Survey; Gen. Jacob Ammen, and Mr. D. S. Walton, civil engineer.

The different reports of these expeditions, covering a period of five years, are to be found in several thick volumes. The report of Commander Shufeldt, on Tehuantepec, is printed as Senate Executive Document No. 6, Forty-second Congress, second session.

The report upon the survey of Darien, by Commander Selfridge, was published in 1874 by the Navy Department.

The result of the Hatfield and Lull explorations were printed as Senate Executive Document No. 57, Forty-third Congress, first session.

The reports of explorations and surveys for the location of canals through the Isthmus of Panama, or by the valley of the Nipipi River, by Commanders E. P. Lull and F. Collins, were published conjointly in Washington in 1875.

Finally, the reports of Major McFarland, General Ammen, and Professor Mitchell, of the commission of reinspection of 1874, were sent to the Senate by President Hayes in April, 1879; but, with the exception of that of Professor Mitchell, which will be found in the annual report of the Coast Survey for 1874, Appendix 12, they have not been printed in full.

All these reports are exhaustively reviewed by Admiral Ammen, in his most important work entitled "The American Interoceanic Ship-Canal Question," 1880; and also by Lieut. J. T. Sullivan, in his Problem of Interoceanic Communication, published by order of the Bureau of Navigation, Washington, 1883, to both of which works we are much indebted.

The Commission was composed of Andrew A. Humphreys, brigadier-general and Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, etc.; C. P. Patterson, Superintendent United States Coast Survey; and Daniel Ammen, commodore and Chief of the Bureau of Navigation.

This Commission was an abler commission than any other that was ever organized to investigate the interoceanic route across the Isthmus. It is not any disparagement of the present Commission to say that the Commission composed of these men was abler than any other. These men were conspicuous during the war.

They had been over the route and knew something about it. General Grant felt a deep interest in it. These men made actual surveys and did a great work. I have talked with them about the hardships of contending against the terrible jungles through which they had to cut their way. They cut their way across all these routes, making but a few rods a day. There is not one of the routes named through which the officers of the Army and Navy have not plowed their way with accurate surveys.

This Commission was appointed in 1872. The survey began before that. As soon as Grant was inaugurated he had the surveys commenced. He appointed a Commission to follow it up. Here is the report of the Commission; it is very short; it was sent to Congress by President Hayes April 18, 1879 (Senate Executive Document No. 15, Forty-sixth Congress, first session), but the surveys had been continued all through Grant's Administration:

WASHINGTON CITY, February 7, 1876.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

The Commission appointed by you to consider the subject of communication by canal between the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, across, over, or near the Isthmus connecting North and South America, have the honor, after a long and careful and minute study of the several surveys of the various routes across the continent, unanimously to report:

1. That the route known as the "Nicaragua route," beginning on the Atlantic side at or near Greytown; running by canal to the San Juan River; thence following its left bank to the mouth of the San Carlos River, at which point navigation of the San Juan River begins, and by the aid of three short canals of an aggregate length of 3.5 miles reaches Lake Nicaragua; from thence across the lake and through the valleys of the Rio del Medio and the Rio Grande to what is known as the port of Brito, on the Pacific coast, possesses, both for the construction and maintenance of a canal, greater advantages and offers fewer difficulties, from engineering, commercial, and economic points of view, than ony one of the other routes shown to be practicable by surveys sufficiently in detail to enable a judgment to be formed of their relative merits, as will be briefly presented in the appended memorandum.

The data for the conclusions of the Commission will be found in the reports of the various surveys and examinations made under the direction and auspices of the Navy Department, copies of which are transmitted herewith.

A statement relating to these surveys and examinations, with a brief account of the characteristic features of the routes, will be found in the accompanying memorandum prepared by the Commission.

We have the honor to be, with high respect, your obedient servants,

ANDREW A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, U. S. A., etc.
C. P. PATTERSON,
Superintendent United States Coast Survey.
DANL. AMMEN,
Commodore and Chief of Bureau of Navigation.

Three greater names for purposes of this kind can not be found in this or the former generation. They were men of high character, very cautious, very learned, who had given this subject very careful examination, In this memorandum they give a description of the Nicaragua route and the Panama route. Their description of the Nicaragua route is found on pages 4 and 5 of the above-named document, which I will insert in my remarks without reading:

THE NICARAGUA ROUTE.

Commander E. P. Lull, United States Navy, with a corps of junior officers and Civil Engineer A. G. Menocal, made the survey of this route. The summit level is designed to be 107.62 feet above the two oceans, the surface of Lake Nicaragua being maintained at the highest water mark by a dam at Castillo.

Two harbors must be constructed, one at or near Greytown, the other at Brito, on the Pacific.

The eastern division is 108.5 miles long, of which 42 miles is canal, extending from the proposed harbor on the eastern coast to and along the San Juan River to the mouth of the river San Carlos, at which point slack-water navigation of the San Juan begins, and, by the aid of three short canals, having an agggegate length of 3.5 miles, around the proposed dams in the San Juan (four in number), reaches to Lake Nicaragua, a distance of 63 miles of slack-water navigation.

The four dams alluded to are located as follows, with dimensions as given:

No. 1. Castillo, 940 feet long, 21 feet high.
No. 2. Balas, 1,196 feet long, 31.9 feet high.
No. 3. Machuca, 824 feet long, 34 feet high.
No. 4. San Carlos, 1,000 feet long, 31 feet high.

Ten lift locks are required, of an average lift of 10.76 feet each. They are all located on hard ground, and only at one location are two locks placed together.

Different parts of the San Juan River, utilized by means of dams for slack-water navigation, must be deepened by dredging, and to a small extent excavated in rock.

Owing to the great extent of Lake Nicaragua (2,800 superficial miles, to be further increased through the Castillo dam), which receives the silt of the watersheds that drain into it, the flow of water in the river is nearly equalized throughout the year, so as effectually to prevent floods or freshets. This is an important consideration in its bearing upon the construction and the maintenance of the interoceanic canal works. The watersheds, too, bordering on the upper San Juan, by reason of the trends of the San Carlos and other rivers, are shown to be of limited extent, and do not seriously affect the rise of the San Juan. The water supply is sufficient for any possible contingency.

A later reconnoissance shows that a shorter and better location of the lower portion of the eastern division can undoubtedly be found.

The middle division comprises the lake navigation, a distance of 56.5 miles, with channels of approach at either end requiring dredging and other work.

The western division, extending from Lake Nicaragua to Brito, is 16.33 miles long, and requires 10 lift locks, 1 tide lock, and a new channel for a part of the Rio Grande.

The deepest cutting is through a mere crest, 730 feet in height, and the excavations are not of extraordinary magnitude on this division.

The Commission has derived much advantage from the reports of Maj. Walter McFarland, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, Gen. Jacob Ammen, and Prof. Henry Mitchell, of the United States Coast Survey; reports based upon reliable information and personal observation in their inspection of the country and of various points on the line as located.

Whatever differences may exist between the reports of Civil Engineer Menocal and those of the gentlemen referred to, it is conceded that the surveys are sufficient to make an approximate estimate of the amount and character of the work necessary to construct the canal.

The questions relating to the enlargement of the works deemed necessary by Major McFarland, the construction of more extensive harbors, the relative cost of labor and material there as compared with the rates in our country, as well as the determination of the best location possible, will doubtless engage the careful attention of those concerned in its construction.

Respecting the magnitude of the harbors, it is to be remarked that on the west coast the port of San Juan del Sur would serve as a convenient port to await entrance to the canal, the actual distance apart being about 5 miles.

The sea is usually so smooth and bad weather so unusual that vessels can anchor off Brito itself, in the open sea, to await the opportunity of entering the canal. Gales of wind are almost, if not wholly, unknown in that region, and squalls are off the land, in no degree endangering the safety of a vessel at anchor off the coast. Nevertheless a heavy ocean swell rolls in, rendering ample breakwaters necessary to secure smooth water at the entrance to the canal.

More difficulties exist on the eastern coast, and a smooth anchorage would be desirable for vessels awaiting transit. But even there the anchorage, although disagreeable without shelter, would be regarded as safe. Here, as on the west coast, it is requisite that the entrance to the canal should have smooth water, which can only be secured by the construction of ample breakwaters.

Respecting the length of locks proposed (400 feet), the canal should be built for the class of vessels best adapted to extended navigation, which class would in general follow the routes of prevailing winds. Extreme length should be discouraged as well for a true economy as for safety of passengers. Vessels of exceptional length can go, as now, through the Straits of Magellan.

No doubt exists as to the entire practicability of constructing an interoceanic ship canal via Lake Nicaragua. If the work were conducted with ability and honesty, it could be completed within a moderate period of time and at a cost that would prove commercially profitable by the payment of tolls, moderate when compared with the loss of time, wear and tear, deterioration of cargo, insurance, etc., that belong to voyages via Cape Horn or the Straits of Magellan. The cost of construction of the canal and harbors, with all their necessary adjuncts—locks 400 feet in length and 26 feet depth of water—may be set down as at least $100,000,000.

They dispose of the Panama route in a short paragraph, which I will read:

THE PANAMA ROUTE.

At the request of the Commission, for reasons previously stated, the honorable Secretary of the Navy caused a careful instrumental survey of this route to be made in the vicinity of the line of the Panama Railroad.

The proposed route is 41.7 miles long; has a summit level of 123.7 feet (surface of canal above the ocean); requires a dam and feeder 10.5 miles long; a retained dam at Obispo station; an aqueduct across the Chagres River; a deep cut at the summit level 4.81 miles long, with a mean depth of 102 feet and greatest depth of 197 feet; the construction of the lift locks necessary to overcome the summit level, and, what is common to all of the routes, the construction of harbors on each coast. The deep cut would probably be subject to landslides, from which the Panama Railroad has suffered seriously, and the canal would be exposed to serious injury from flood. The excavation of the deep cut, involving the handling and transport of millions of cubic yards of materials, is of itself a very great undertaking, especially in such climate as that of the Isthmus.

The cost of the whole work, including that necessary in the harbor of Panama and at Aspinwall, is estimated to exceed by nearly 50 per cent that of the Nicaragua route.

They proposed to construct a canal, the only possible one, with a cut less than 200 feet deep. They said that was difficult on account of the sliding character of the land. Anybody can see that who has seen the soapstone slipping the railroad down and the amount of work they have to do to keep up the railroad. But they did not propose to go down with a cut 300 feet by any means. They did not propose to build a dam down there and raise the water. They propose to go high up on the river, build a dam, run a tunnel through the mountain, and bring the water in that way. That kind of a canal would be possible. But it would have to be at a greater elevation than at Nicaragua, and it would cost a great deal more.

Such a canal would be possible at Panama, but it would not answer the demands of an interoceanic canal. A cut 7 miles long and 300 feet deep, as is now proposed, must be a failure. No power on earth could prevent the slide of land on both sides from closing up the canal unless it was arched all the way. The kind of rock met with in constructing the Panama Railroad showed how a canal would be affected.

But the greatest obstacle, which I will discuss further on, is to control the Chagres River by means of the proposed Bohio Dam. The surveys and explorations upon which the report of the Commission above quoted was based were made by engineers of the very highest character and with more care and diligence than any other interoceanic survey. There have been no such examinations made since Commodore Ammen's work was done. Other people of more or less reputation and more or less industry have made some surveys, but no complete surveys have been made under Government authority since Grant's Administration.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Nevada means the Lull surveys?

Mr. STEWART. The surveys made by Lull, Menocal, and others whose names appear in the list I have given.

After the Government of the United States had examined all the routes and officially determined that Nicaragua was the best route, a Frenchman by the name of M. Lucien Napoleon Bonaparte Wyse went to Panama and obtained from the Colombian Government a concession to build the Panama Canal. There was no study or investigation of the route previous to the concession. One M. Reclus had spent on the isthmus fourteen days in April, 1878, between the 2d and 16th of that month. These were all the surveys required for the De Lesseps great enterprise, or, more properly speaking, great swindle.

Before organizing or attempting to float a company De Lesseps called what he denominated a congress to meet in Paris to determine the best route. He fixed the number of delegates and stocked the congress in advance. De Lesseps himself made several orations, and among other things he said:

I will not enter into the scientific question. I will only ask the technical commission to tell us precisely what would be the expense of a canal à niveau (sea level); what estimates can be made of that expense, and especially what the cost will be in future (after construction) for canals à niveau (sea level) or for those with locks. Governments can encourage such enterprises; they can not execute them. It is the public, then, on whom we must call; and when you come before them they will ask of you (if it is a canal with locks) what will be the expense in the future.

I will express my opinion. I consider that a canal with locks would retard navigation. From the experience we have had at Suez, a ship must not now be delayed. There are a thousand Philistines there who can load a ship of 400 tons in an hour. It is to be remembered also that it cost a ship of a thousand tons 2,000 francs for every day's delay. I have often been consulted on this subject. I have always replied by dispatch that ships must not be delayed in their passage. They are informed that it will be well for them to wait the rise of the tide when they can not be sure of their being able to steer satisfactorily. (The Panama Canal, Rodrigues.)

Don Manuel M. Peralta asked the following question:

The American scientific commission decided on the Nicaragua route, since it was demonstrated that the Panama route was impossible. Is there no ground for taking its decision into consideration?

M. DE LESSEPS. The Government declared that there was no impossibility for a canal with locks, and that it could not assert that a canal à niveau (sea level) was impossible. The Government, in its fairness, was absorbed in one idea only.

De Lesseps would not consider a canal with locks. He wanted a sea-level canal for his swindling purposes. A man who would advocate a sea-level canal across the Isthmus without ever having visited that part of the world or having a survey made by anyone else ought not to be trusted. He wanted a sea-level canal for the purpose of getting money from the public, as he acknowledges in the speech above quoted.

The appointment of the committee to select a route discloses the scheme of De Lesseps. Persons who had never seen the Isthmus served his purpose better than intelligent engineers who had examined it. He wanted a favorable report for a sea-level canal at Panama and he took means to secure it.

The vast sums which De Lesseps robbed the people of in floating his new scheme show why he wanted a report for a sea-level canal with which to deceive the people. Rodrigues gives us the expenses of the formation of the Panama Company as follows:

As to the "expenses which M. Ferdinand de Lesseps has been forced to incur in order to arrive at the formation of your company," the commissioners reported as follows:

"In the first place there are the expenses for the first issue made in 1879; for the propaganda which preceded the formation of the syndicate of that subscription; the outlay made on account of the different expeditions sent to the Isthmus, and finally the expense with the recent issue of 590,000 shares, including placarding, advertising, postage, the transportation and the centralizing of funds, the expenses with the personnel, as well as all commissions due to the bankers, intermediaries, and promoters, not only in France, but abroad. The total under this head amounts to 10,801,577 francs 5c., which represent 1.8 per cent of the total capital necessary for building the canal.

"To that sum * * * we must add the remuneration stipulated as profit for the members of the international syndicate which was kind enough to make advances of considerable funds necessary for the formation of your company, sums which would have been lost by them had the public failed to respond to their appeal. That remuneration amounts to 11,800,000 francs. * * *

"There is still an agreement made with the American financial group which has charged itself with the task of representing the company's interest in the United States. * * * Such agreement brings us a liability of six annual payments, as follows: 3,100,000 francs soon after the organization of the company; 1,400,000 francs payable one year after; and five payments of 1,500,000 francs at the end of each of the five following years. Such expenses should appear in your annual budgets."

Such was the report of the first finance committee of the Panama Canal Company.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. How many in all?

Mr. STEWART. In another place it is summed up here.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. STEWART. I am reading from Rodrigues's History of the Panama Canal, which is said to be authentic. He copies it from the company's reports. There is no doubt about this being accurate, because it is taken from the public reports:

Such was the report of the first finance committee of the Panama Canal Company. The poor 16,000 women and other shareholders were called upon, not only to pay £400,000 for the concession—

But also to defray the expenses of the first fiasco of M. de Lesseps and the "propaganda that preceded" it—that is to say, the "international congress," the lecturing tour of M. de Lesseps, the bribing of newspapers, the "technical commission," and travels of M. de Lesseps to the Isthmus and to America, and commissions due to intermediaries of all classes. Then besides that there were commissions due to the "international syndicate"—greedy and useless middlemen. As to the American syndicate, it is one of the most shameful corruption funds ever recorded in the history of financial enterprises.

Imagine this expenditure of £480,000, so that a few men in New York might represent the company in America and cooperate with it when requested. To that fund is due the success which attended M. de Lesseps' invitation to the then Secretary of the Navy of the United States to accept the presidency of the syndicate, and no respectable bankers should ever have participated in that costly fraud upon the shareholders of the Panama Canal Company, as three firms in New York did. These men are challenged to show that they ever did anything for the company except lend their names, so that here in Europe M. de Lesseps might say that "America was all right." The three houses deserve the hearty reprobation that will be visited some day upon all who have intrigued and plotted to obtain the money from the poor French people. The corruption fund is in New York still; it is doing its work of bribery and of systematic chicanery; and the Americans, who are considered so shrewd, whose press claims to throw light on all the dark corners of finance, have been bearing this insult to their good sense with singular equanimity.

This was written some time ago. It was not written since this matter came up.

Imagine now a company in England formed on the basis of the Panama Canal, paying £904,000 for preliminary expenses, besides £480,000 for an American corruption fund, altogether £1,384,000, not including £400,000 for the concession! The total amount called on the shares up to this time has been £5,000,000, and yet out of that sum nearly £1,800,000, or 30 per cent, was spent at once on, or set aside for, the concession and preliminary expenses!

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. When was that written?

Mr. STEWART. This book was written in 1885, when the matter was fresh. It was not written for this purpose.

Of course the whole scheme, the pretended international conference, was gotten up to determine which was the best route, when our surveyors and engineers in this country had already determined it and everybody knew which was the best route.

The concession was obtained by Wyse, who was a friend of De Lesseps, and was undoubtedly either his agent or his partner. One million eight hundred thousand pounds, or nearly $9,000,000, paid for a concession that cost nothing, and preliminary expenses incurred to deceive the people, stamp De Lesseps as a high-class criminal. He certainly can not be styled a petit thief.

Who will contend that De Lesseps was acting in good faith? If he was acting in good faith, why would he not examine the route before he entered upon the enterprise? If he thought he had an honest enterprise, why did he take from the people $9,000,000 to advertise it and deceive his victims? He made his congress decide in favor of a sea-level canal. For what purpose was this done? He himself stated:

In order to get the money of the people.

The outcome of this miserable business was a miserable failure. The money spent for propaganda and that spent on the canal did no good. Why should it be contended that the miserable swindlers who are convicted of the Panama deal are more worthy of confidence as to which is the best route than the Commission appointed by President Grant, which made its report based upon actual surveys, and which Commission was composed of the ablest and best men in the Navy? The Walker Commission was the most comfortable one that ever visited the Isthmus of Darien. It spent over a month in Paris and fifteen days at Panama. It tells us in its report:

On the 9th of Agust, 1899, the Commission left New York for Paris, where the New Panama Canal Company opened to its members its records, maps, plans, and profiles, and the results of the surveys made and the data collected by it and the old Panama Canal Company. Mr. Maurice Hutin, the director-general, Mr. L. Choron, the chief engineer, and other officers of the company received the commissioners with great courtesy and were ready at all times to assist them in making a study of this route in all its aspects. A special meeting of the Comité Technique was also called to give the Commissioners such oral explanations as they might desire, some of its members coming from distant parts of Europe for the purpose.

While in Europe the Commission also visited and examined the Kiel Canal in Germany, the North Sea Canal in Holland, and the Manchester Canal and Liverpool docks in England, and returned to New York on the 29th of September.

They were gone fifty days, and they spent about a month in Paris. What did they go there to get? What results? The results of a failure. When we already had surveys that were accurate and were made by disinterested parties, why did the Commission go to Paris to get information from the Panama Company of its failure. They presented no plan. Our commissioners would not accept Panama, although they were there. Let us see how much time they spent at Panama.

As the disturbed conditions in Colombia rendered it inadvisable for the Commission to attempt to meet the President at Bogota, the State Department, at the request of this Commission, communicated with the Colombian authorities through the United States minister there, and asked that a representative of the Government be appointed to meet the commissioners when they reached the country and give them such information and assistance relative to their mission as he conveniently could. In accordance with this request, Mr. J. T. Ford, the consulting engineer of the Republic in technical matters connected with the Panama Canal, was assigned to this duty. He met them in his official capacity on their arrival at Panama, courteously expressed an entire willingness to aid them in their investigations, and accompanied them from day to day upon their visits to different points upon the canal line and elsewhere during their stay upon the Isthmus.

Fifteen days were spent in the department of Panama, during which an investigation of the route from sea to sea was made, as had been done in Nicaragua. The work was greatly facilitated by the local officers of the New Panama Canal Company, who placed two houses in Colon at the service of the commissioners, furnished a special train each day to take them from point to point as the work progressed, permitted them to use their maps and plans, informed them as to the work then going on, accompanied them in their inspection of the line, and exhibited to them the plant and materials purchased by the old canal company for construction purposes, much of which was stored in sheds and warehouses at different points on the Isthmus. During this period the commissioners went over the entire line of the canal from Colon to Panama, and examined the sites for the different auxiliary works. This included a trip to the upper waters of the Chagres, in the Alajuela region, and they returned in boats, so as to have an opportunity of seeing the river.

Now, this is the investigation they made. It was just a junketing tour, and they were entertained at both ends. It has been suggested that that could not possibly influence them. Why did the officials of the company entertain them and treat them if they could not influence them? There was nobody to entertain them on the Nicaragua route, but they were nicely entertained on the Panama route. It may not have had any influence, but why have these entertainments and give them wine to drink and nice things to eat and all that kind of thing if it did not mean anything? I know that is often done. Members of Congress and others get those attentions when their influence is desired.

These entertainments may not have influenced our commissioners. I hope they did not. Something appeared to have unsettled their understanding, for they were first in favor of the Nicaragua and subsequently in favor of the French. If their reasons for the change satisfy them, I do not think the public will enjoy much of that satisfaction. Although they were unable to state with certainty that a canal can be built at Panama on the plan they propose, still they advise the Government of the United States to make an effort to place itself in the position of the New Panama Company. The new company has a contract with the old to build a canal in ten years and give the old company 60 per cent of the proceeds. Instead of building the canal and carrying out its contract with the old company, the new company proposes to sell to the United States for $40,000,000. It is too absurd for argument to contend that the new company has any power to sell anything unless the United States is willing to be substituted for the new company, build the canal, and give the old company 60 per cent of the proceeds after it is built. No legal quibbling can satisfy plain men that the new company can sell out the old.

But, to make it appear plausible, it is proposed to turn the negotiations over to the President. If he can find any person or corporation who can make title to the United States, he is required to buy out the assets of the De Lesseps swindle and proceed to spend the money of the United States in an effort to construct a canal at Panama. No doubt the President, with unlimited command of money, could buy out the thousands of French victims. He could undoubtedly buy out the knowing ones at his own price if he could satisfy them that they could get no more; but the thousands of ignorant victims, whose hopes have been excited by the glowing promises of the new company, will be harder to deal with, and it would undoubtedly take him years to perfect the title.

But if he will take time enough to satisfy all parties in interest that $40,000,000, or half that sum, is all the United States will pay, he can get the title at his own price, and it might be possible to commence the doubtful, if not impossible, undertaking of building a canal at Panama within the next six or seven years.

The criticism of the title of the Nicaragua Canal is hardly worth discussing. Both Costa Rica and Nicaragua want the canal, and there is no danger of any failure on their part in making title to the United States sufficient for the purposes of the canal for a moderate subsidy in money.

The Hepburn bill providing for the construction of the canal at Nicaragua has passed the House twice in response to a strong popular demand. The passage of that bill by the Senate would end the matter, and the construction of the canal would be commenced at once. It seems unfortunate, after the United States at great expense has ascertained that the Nicaragua route is the best route, that the work of the commission appointed by Grant and the numerous surveys made during his eight years in the White House should be turned down and held for naught, and that the casual observations of the Frenchmen Wyse and M. Reclus for fourteen days should be treated as a demonstration of the superiority of the Panama route over all others, for that was the only investigation made by De Lesseps previous to proclaiming to the world the feasibility of a sea-level canal at Panama. Am I harsh in my conclusion that a sea-level canal was not De Lesseps's paramount object, when it is shown by the record of the Panama swindle that he and his coconspirators pocketed the sum of nine millions in launching the enterprise? How much more they took unto themselves while the work was progressing on the canal must be left to the imagination.

But suppose the President succeeds in buying the French title. He will have the Colombian Government to deal with. Does anybody suppose that that Government will not find ways and means to extort money from the United States when it is ascertained that the French title has been bought and the President is compelled to comply with any demands that Colombia may make?

The United States has for the last hundred years felt a lively interest in an isthmian canal, and it has been asserted over and over again that this Government must exercise a controlling influence over any canal, whoever might build it.

Why did not the United States protest effectively against the De Lesseps canal? There were two obvious reasons:

1. From the surveys and explorations made during Grant's Administration it was not believed that it was practical to build a canal at Panama. The possible canal at that point suggested by Grant's commission, if it could be built, would be of doubtful utility.

2. Because the reckless and blind extravagance of the De Lesseps Company, proceeding as it did to spend money without an adequate examination, or without any examination at all, soon disclosed the fact that there was no bona fide intention on the part of the manipulators to construct a canal at Panama.

It is conceded that whatever route is adopted for a lock canal there must be a lake or reservoir to supply the same with water. Nicaragua has a natural water supply. The Walker Commission says, on page 257 of their report:

> The investigations made in connection with the regulations of Lake Nicaragua have demonstrated that that lake affords an inexhaustible water supply for the canal by that route.

Speaking of Panama in the same connection and on the same page, I quote as follows from the report:

> The initial proposition, on the other hand, for the Panama route is to form Lake Bohio so as to yield a water supply for a traffic of 10,000,000 tons, which can be supplemented when needed by an amount sufficient for more than four times that traffic, by means of the Alajuela reservoir. For all practical purposes this may be considered an unlimited supply for the Panama route. So far as the practical operation of a ship canal is concerned, therefore, the water-supply features on both lines are satisfactory.

The Bohio Dam is not yet constructed, and the testimony before the committee shows that nobody now living knows positively whether it can be constructed or not. It is proposed to sink caissons 130 feet below sea level. When this shall have been accomplished the race of men furnishing the laborers will be largely diminished. If it is possible for a human being to stand the air pressure 130 feet below the sea level at Panama, everbody doubts it, and no member of the Commission was able to find reasons to remove his own doubts.

I do not remember the exact height of the proposed Bohio dam. I ask the Senator from Alabama what is the whole height of that dam? I know how far they have got to go down to put in their caisson.

Mr. MORGAN. It is 190 feet.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. From the ground up?

Mr. STEWART. To the bedrock it is about 130 feet.

Mr. MORGAN. One hundred and twenty-seven feet.

Mr. STEWART. It is pretty near 130 feet. I have seen the Chagres River when it was mad, and it is the most terrible stream I ever saw. Right at the Isthmus, in the doldrums there, the rain comes down like a cloudburst, and the river rises with such rapidity that you are compelled to run to get out of the way of it. I climbed up on the crags quite a distance to get away from it. I was afraid it would catch me. It was rising so fast that you could see it rising as the flood came down. When the flood commences you have at once to seek shelter in order to get away from it. I have never seen anything in my life like the rainfall in that country. It is now proposed to build a dam there, where you have to contend with the disadvantages of such a river and such a climate.

Our engineers—Ammen, Humphreys, and Patterson—did not propose to build a dam at the point the Walker Commission now recommend. The Grant Commission proposed to sink a cut less than 200 feet deep instead of 300, as proposed by the Walker Commission, and to carry the canal over the Chagres River instead of damming that river. The Grant Commission proposed to supply the canal with water by going up the Chagres River and constructing lakes or reservoirs and taking the water therefrom through a tunnel—an aqueduct into the proposed canal. Even then the Grant Commission suggested that it would be very difficult to maintain a cut of the depth proposed by that Commission on account of the sliding character of the material through which the cut must be constructed.

I am aware that it is argued that there has been a great advance in engineering since the Grant commission made their report, but the engineers who testified before the committee admitted that engineering had not yet advanced far enough to furnish examples or parallels of the proposed Bohio dam. I have seen no satisfactory solution of the difficulty suggested by the Grant commission of preventing slides filling the cut, which has to be at least 300 feet deep. There is nothing in the evidence or the report of the Walker commission to show that a cut 300 feet deep in the sliding material on the Panama route can be kept open. Science has not sufficiently advanced to solve that problem, unless it is proposed to make a cut several miles in width. It does not appear that there is anything in the surveys or maps of the bankrupt French company so far in advance of modern discoveries in science as to demonstrate the feasibility of either the cut or the Bohio dam. The Walker commission must have an idea that there is some occult knowledge in the refuse of the Panama failure or they would not suggest the payment of $2,000,000 for surveys and plans which nobody proposes to follow.

If there was nothing else objectionable in the negotiations of the Walker commission but the proposition to pay $2,000,000 for the French surveys, a prudent man would hardly employ that commission to negotiate for rat traps, much less to act as agents of the United States in transactions involving millions.

The great lake at Nicaragua, which the committee say contains an inexhaustible supply of water, already exists. It has about 800 square miles of watersheds and 200 square miles of lake surface. All the reports show that the water supply is abundant. There is a lake which is already made; it requires no impossible dam to create it.

There is no engineering proposition connected with the Nicaragua route the like of which has not been heretofore accomplished. Some of the work may be difficult, but all of the work to be done has a parallel elsewhere. Everybody knows that a canal can be built there.

At Panama you would have to make a water supply by the construction of a dam, the possibilities of which are an unknown quantity. It is suggested that a temporary dam must be built while the principal dam is being constructed. No one has demonstrated that there is time enough in the dry season to construct even a temporary dam. When the floods come, whether the design be for a temporary dam or a permanent structure, if it is not completed, it will go with the first flood. It never occurred to the Grant Commission, after years of careful surveys and investigation, to build a dam at Bohio, but they regarded the plan suggested by them as even doubtful by reason of the sliding character of the material through which the cut they proposed must have been constructed. No one contends that there is no possibility of failure of the Walker Commission plan either in keeping open the cut or constructing the Bohio dam. Still Senators insist that the Nicaragua route must be abandoned, where no untried engineering difficulties exist, and the Panama route adopted, where no one can state with certainty that a canal is possible. Certainly what is proposed by the Walker Commission is far beyond engineering experience.

I am unwilling to surrender a certainty for an uncertainty. I do not believe that a canal at Panama will ever be built. I fear the effect of the amendment. I do not charge anyone with such intention, but I very much fear that if the amendment is adopted it will defeat any canal during the present generation, and perhaps for all time.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Why?

Mr. STEWART. Because if you abandon the Nicaragua route and adopt the other, before you proceed very far with the work you will find that it will have to be abandoned, and there will be no canal.

The people have looked for the building of a canal at Nicaragua for many years. After the examinations which were made under the direction of General Grant were published throughout the United States the people settled down to the conviction that the Nicaragua route is the one that should be selected for a canal. That has been understood; and every year in the platforms of both political parties the building of a Nicaraguan canal has been advocated.

The people do not speak of any other canal, and if you should now select this other route it will be regarded by the people as an abandonment of an isthmian canal. They know what the effect will be. They know that Panama is a pest hole and the worst place on earth. They know there is no wind there to blow away the miasmatic poisons engendered there, and they know that Americans can not live there. The people of the West, and particularly of California, who have passed over the Panama route know what a terrible place it is. They know that nobody can go there and live. On the contrary, at Nicaragua a breeze nearly always prevails, and it is a healthy country. Americans will go there and cities will be built. There is no climate on earth as bad as the particular spot where it is proposed to locate the Panama Canal. This results not only because it is in the Tropics, but because there is no air stirring, and the want of air is death to the navigation of sailing vessels. But that is not the worst of it—it is death to human life. Where you can have a breeze in the tropics there you can have health, but you can not have it without air. It is worse than a dungeon as far as air is concerned. It has been said that Panama is so sickly because so many people have crossed it and it has been used so long. There are many places that have been used a good while that are not sickly. I do not think the use of land or the use of a country makes it sickly.

In the agreements concerning Panama we are to take care of the sanitary conditions. We have not money enough to make Panama healthy. It can not be done. If you would go there in the seasons when the wind does not blow, you would see what a condition the people are in and how they suffer, and you would appreciate the terrors of living in such a place. I do not wonder that France wants to get rid of the Panama Canal. Of course these fellows want to make money out of it; but do you believe if it had been a practical scheme and could be developed under French engineers that the canal would not have been built by France, even after the French people had been robbed of $10,000,000 in floating the company? Even after all that occurred, if the French engineers had said, "Here is a perfectly practical scheme; we can build this canal and you can get your money back," the French Government would have proceeded with the building of that canal. Do you believe that France, which is a strong nation, would ever have abandoned that work if the French Government had believed it feasible? No; it is only because they got reports from their engineers that it was an impossible thing that the French Government abandoned the enterprise.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator seems to think $40,000,000 is a great deal more than the Panama Canal is worth.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think it is worth a cent.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Then, why will the stockholders in France have a right to complain if they are getting this immense price for the work already done there?

Mr. STEWART. Because they will not get any of it. These fellows are going to sell them out. I think, as a principal, I would have the right to complain if my servant sold my horse and took the money himself.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will not the liquidator protect the stockholders?

Mr. STEWART. No; I do not think the liquidator has agreed to do that. This company is going to get $40,000,000 for a contract they have to build a canal; and, if they build it, they will have 40 per cent interest, and somebody is going to get swindled. If you could see how crooked that company has been from the beginning, how much swindling has been committed, and read the criminal records and see how many have gone to jail, you would not want the United States subrogated to any rights in that canal. The United States ought not to be subrogated to any of the rascality connected with that canal. The company had ten millions to start with, nearly five hundred thousand of which was spent in this country, and there has been great scandal about the expenditure. Why was it spent here? Why was $10,000,000 spent for the purpose of a propaganda? I tell you that the thing is too rotten for us to negotiate with, particularly when we are to get something we do not want and get something that has been condemned by our engineers.

No man dare say that Ammen, Patterson, and Humphreys, who reported on the various interoceanic canal routes, were not eminent engineers and that they acted on ample information secured by many careful, practical engineers of the highest character. President Grant was an enthusiastic advocate of an interoceanic canal. Abundant appropriations were made, and the investigation of the various routes occupied nearly all of his eight years in the White House. I watched the progress of these surveys, and, as I passed over the Isthmus frequently, I had some personal knowledge of the conditions and know that the Nicaragua route was selected, not from any personal interest or prejudices, but because it was demonstrated by the surveys and investigations made during General Grant's Presidency that it was the best, if not the only practical route. The report of Grant's Commission established that fact and the American people accepted it as final.

It is not shown that the Walker Commission have made an adequate survey of the Panama route. They have made no report and show no plan which will convince anyone that the cut of 300 feet they propose can be kept open. They show no plan of a dam which they dare say is practicable. Their statements about the climatic conditions are wide of the mark. Anyone need not visit the Isthmus to know that Panama must always be an unhealthy place when they are informed by all navigators and by the inhabitants of the Isthmus that there is no breeze in the Bay of Panama for months together that will fill a sail. When the sun comes out after one of the rains, or rather cloudbursts, that occur, the steam goes up from the land and the whole Isthmus is a cauldron of poisonous vapor. On the other hand, the reason why Nicaragua is a healthy place is because they have constant breezes from either ocean, which purify the atmosphere and make it a most healthful and delightful place of residence.

After De Lesseps had decided without examination to build a sea-level canal for the purpose of robbing the subscribers, he visited this country to corroborate on his return what he had said while he knew nothing of the subject. No attention was paid to him in this country except what was bought with the $2,400,000 spent in New York to manipulate public opinion in this country and to prevent opposition. He called on the President and was told that whenever a canal was built across the Isthmus the United States expected to have a controlling interest in it.

If the De Lesseps scheme had been regarded as practicable, it would have required more than $2,400,000 to have bought the silence of the United States. The attempt to build the canal by extravagant expenditures on an impossible route did not materially interest this Government. How different the attitude of the United States when the question of the Nicaragua Canal was under consideration. Men in the Senate went so far as to intimate a willingness to involve this country in war with England to protect that route. Why were the American people so zealous that they would fight England for the Nicaragua route, while they were indifferent to the proceedings of the French on the Panama route? The reason was that the Grant Commission, who had examined all the routes, pronounced the Nicaragua route the best, and in fact the only practical route. And the same commission had condemned the Panama route.

I met people almost every day on the Pacific coast or in New York who had passed over the Panama Railroad while the De Lesseps company was engaged in wasting the money of the victims of that colossal swindle, and they invariably gave it as their opinion that the French would never build the canal and did not believe that they had any serious intention of doing so.

When the bubble burst and thousands of poor Frenchmen who had lost their money were forced to realize the great swindle, Americans looked on in pity rather than in anger. The French courts of justice considered every extenuating circumstance, but were compelled to condemn and imprison the leading characters in the swindle.

But we are told that the Walker Commission has settled everything. It is no disparagement to the Walker Commission to say that in character, learning, and ability it was not equal to the Grant Commission composed of Humphreys, Patterson, and Ammen. Besides, the Walker Commission got its information in fifteen days on the Isthmus, riding in Pullman cars and dining sumptuously in houses provided by the new company who were offering a canal they did not own for sale for many millions of dollars. Who would put such an examination under such circumstances against the examination of the commission appointed by Grant which was occupied for years in surveys and explorations? Nothing has been offered by the Walker Commission to shake the conclusions of the Grant Commission. But the Walker Commission, with nothing showing the practicability of the Panama route to offer, asks the United States to pay $2,000,000 for the discarded maps and surveys of the De Lesseps swindle.

I appeal to Senators before they decide that Panama is to the extent of $40,000,000 the better route to compare the reports of the two commissions and the character of the men. I beg leave to again read the report of the Grant Commission as to which is the better route:

WASHINGTON CITY, February 7, 1876.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

The Commission appointed by you to consider the subject of communication by canal between the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans across, over, or near the Isthmus connecting North and South America, have the honor, after a long, careful, and minute study of the several surveys of the various routes across the continent, unanimously to report:

1. That the route known as the "Nicaragua route," beginning on the Atlantic side at or near Greytown, running by canal to the San Juan River; thence following its left bank to the mouth of the San Carlos River, at which point navigation of the San Juan River begins, and by the aid of three short canals of an aggregate length of 3.5 miles reaches Lake Nicaragua; from thence across the lake and through the valleys of the Rio del Medio and the Rio Grande to what is known as the port of Brito, on the Pacific coast, possesses, both for the construction and maintenance of a canal, greater advantages and offers fewer difficulties from engineering, commercial, and economic points of view than any one of the other routes shown to be practicable by surveys sufficient in detail to enable a judgment to be formed of their relative merits, as will be briefly presented in the appended memorandum.

The data for the conclusion of the Commission will be found in the reports of the various surveys and examinations made under the direction and auspices of the Navy Department, copies of which are transmitted herewith.

A statement relating to these surveys and examinations, with a brief account of the characteristic features of the routes, will be found in the accompanying memorandum prepared by the Commission.

We have the honor to be, with high respect, your obedient servants,

ANDREW A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, U. S. A., etc.
C. P. PATTERSON,
Superintendent United States Coast Survey.
DANL. AMMEN,
Commodore and Chief of Bureau of Navigation.

I was familiar with most of the officers making these surveys. In addition to their written reports they frequently described to me the great difficulties and hardships they experienced in getting through the jungles on the various routes. Their task was no easy one. It was the most difficult and arduous labor ever imposed upon officers of the Government, but the task was well performed, on foot, making actual surveys; not in palace cars with luxuriant lodgings, in palaces built with French money, or in social dinings and winings in the gorgeous saloons of Paris.

The people of the United States, whether for good or evil, desire the Nicaragua Canal. They are satisfied with the reports made on that route. They are satisfied with the Nicaragua route, more particularly because no adverse report has ever been made by any engineer of respectability. Even the Walker commission, with all its French surroundings and leanings, tell us that the Nicaragua route is perfectly practicable, and that there is no engineering difficulty the like of which has not been overcome. Their doubts all relate to the construction of a canal on the route that they advise the United States to purchase for $40,000,000.

I would not grieve over the $40,000,000 wasted if I did not believe that the turning down of the Nicaragua route will delay, if not permanently prevent, the construction of any canal.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that if he will examine the platform of the last Republican convention he will notice that its recommendation is for an interoceanic canal.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; but I hope at that time the Republican convention was not anticipating Walker's report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly they were anticipating what is going to happen.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; the Nicaragua Canal bill which has passed the House at two sessions may be sidetracked for the abandoned scheme of the French swindlers. When the people of the United States ask for a canal on a feasible route in a delightful climate and country they may be given the opportunity to buy an impossible route with $40,000,000 in a climate as destructive to human life as the Black Hole of Calcutta.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to go on at the present time, it is rather immaterial to me whether I speak on this bill now or not——

Mr. SPOONER. I yield with pleasure to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will speak very briefly, if at all.

Mr. SPOONER. I can speak at another time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, for many years I have believed that a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans was a commercial necessity, and I have been equally impressed heretofore with the belief that the Nicaragua route was preferable to any other. That belief was strengthened when the Isthmian Canal Commission, in its preliminary reports, favored Nicaragua, but when the same Commission, after a careful reconsideration and review of the case, including the amended offer of the New Panama Canal Company, expressed a preference for the Panama route, my views were sufficiently changed to lead me to carefully investigate the matter, which I have done, with the result that I am now thoroughly of opinion that the Panama route is the one that ought to be selected.

My impression is, Mr. President, that the people of New Hampshire have reached the same conclusion, at least I infer so from letters received on that subject, three of which I will read, two of them being from accomplished engineers.

The first letter is from Mr. E. R. Brown, president of the Strafford Savings Bank, of Dover, N. H. He is an educated gentleman of large business experience, whose views are entitled to serious consideration.

Mr. Brown says:

STRAFFORD SAVINGS BANK,
Dover, N. H., January 6, 1902.

DEAR SIR: I sincerely hope that the Senate will give the Panama route for the canal full consideration. I am in favor of this route for the following reasons: It has fewer locks and requires less time in transit, and may be made a sea-level canal. The annual cost of maintenance is much less. It has good harbors. It is not in the earthquake region. These are only a few among many reasons why it should be preferred over the Nicaragua route, but my main reason is that if the Panama route is selected there will never be a second canal cut to trouble us, or at least for many years, while if the Nicaragua route is taken the Panama Canal will be completed before many years by some company or nation.

Very truly, yours,

E. R. BROWN.

HON. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The next letter is from an old gentleman in the State of New Hampshire, Mr. Samuel Webber, of Charlestown, who in his early years was engaged in engineering projects. He is now retired from active service, and notwithstanding he is advanced in years he keeps abreast of the times and has taken great interest in the matter of an interoceanic canal. I give the part of his letter which refers to that project:

CHARLESTOWN, N. H., June 9, 1902.

MY DEAR DR. GALLINGER: I wrote you some two years since to "go slow" on the isthmian canal, and the time is now coming for a move. From an engineer's view of the matter, I decidedly favor Panama. We can see pretty plainly what is to be done there, but we can not see bottom on the Nicaragua project, and I think it would be as likely to cost four hundred millions as not.

The objection to a dam at Bohio, on the Panama route, are not half those to the one at Ochoa, on the Nicaragua plan, judging from the reports you have sent me, and the shorter route and less time in transit dispel the climatic objections which are urged. I am decidedly in favor of Mr. HOAR'S bill, if the financial arrangements with the French and Colombian interests can be made satisfactory and secure. I speak as a hydraulic engineer of some experience.

Yours, very truly, SAML. WEBBER.

The third letter is from Prof. Robert Fletcher, who is the director of the Thayer School of Civil Engineering at Dartmouth College, a gentleman of remarkable attainments and of a very wide knowledge on matters of civil engineering. He says:

HANOVER, N. H., January 7, 1902.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senator from New Hampshire.

MY DEAR SIR: Allow me to address you on a matter of large public interest, on which you will probably have to take action before long as a member of the Senate. Hoping that this may not appear impertinent, it is proper to give the reason for venturing this expression of opinion.

The question is that of the isthmian canal. It is proper to state that I have been a close student of this question for some fifteen years; that the late president of the Maritime Canal Company, Hon. Hiram Hitchcock, was a friend and fellow-townsman; that a number of graduates of this institution were engaged for some years on the surveys prosecuted in Nicaragua by that company; that a lamented colleague was a member of ons of the engineering commissions which made a review of the plans of the aforesaid company; that I have carefully studied the reports of the various commissions that have investigated the Nicaragua Canal scheme, having received copies of the published atlases and documents from both sides, and that on the basis of this prolonged investigation it appears to me that, as an engineering proposition, the Nicaragua Canal scheme should receive little consideration, in view of the accomplished results and the favorable conditions and possibilities at Panama.

It is easy to see by a careful perusal of the recent report of the last Commission that consideration of the engineering features alone would have compelled a report in favor of Panama; but that political considerations, questions of concessions, etc., rendered it inexpedient to allow questions of construction purely to determine the decision. Now, without assuming to be able to weigh these other considerations, it would appear that ultimately the question must be viewed in the light of common sense, and as to all conditions and contingencies from the engineering standpoint.

In view, then, of all the advantages and assured results gained at Panama, the reliable estimates for the future, based on perfected plans, and the large amount of the world's resources already sunk there, it would appear not much less than a stupendous folly to abandon all that and to begin at a new point on a route nearly four times as long, with higher summit levels, nearly double the amount of lockage, three times the amount of curvature, and a confessedly much greater cost of operation ultimately, with problems of unknown magnitude to be worked out, involving probably unsuspected additions to the cost. After weighing all these facts it would appear to an unprejudiced observer that some way must be found to do away with all political and legal obstacles and objections, and reduce the question to its lowest terms as a strictly engineering proposition.

Permit me to say that this expression, which you may judge obtrusive, is not prompted by any person or any interest whatsoever, but by the simple desire of an impartial student to see the great enterprise of piercing this continental barrier accomplished in the best way and along the line of least resistance.

Yours, very respectfully,

ROBERT FLETCHER,
Director Thayer School of Civil Engineering.

Mr. President, I do not propose to take the time of the Senate in discussing many matters connected with this subject which have already received careful attention by Senators on both sides of the question. Suffice it for me to say that my investigations have fully persuaded me that there is much greater danger from earthquakes and volcanoes on the Nicaragua than on the Panama route. A country that prints a picture of a volcano on its postage stamps must not find fault with us if we conclude that there is danger from seismic disturbances in that latitude.

NICARAGUA MORE EXPENSIVE.

Again, I am persuaded that the Nicaragua route will be much more expensive, including the cost of maintenance, than the Panama. If it be true, as the Commission asserts and as has been alleged over and over again in this debate, that it will cost $1,350,000 more annually to operate the Nicaragua than the Panama Canal, it follows that the real difference in cost in favor of Panama will be $72,500,000 instead of $5,000,000, an item that is certainly worth saving.

GREATER CURVES ON NICARAGUA.

That the curves on the Nicaragua are more numerous and troublesome than on the Panama route is admitted by all, and it is a very serious question whether the navigation of the Nicaragua Canal will be at all possible in the night. My investigations on that point leave me in doubt, which no one has seemed able to clear up. Mr. Morison, admittedly one of the leading engineers of the world, gives it as his opinion that night transit for large ships will not be possible on the Nicaragua line.

THE QUESTION OF TIME.

As to the matter of time, I do not find that the contention of the advocates of the Nicaragua route is sustained, even assuming that transit through both canals is placed on an equality; that is, that no advantage shall be claimed for Panama in the matter of night transit. The total length of the Nicaragua Canal, as shown by the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, is 183.66 miles, and of the Panama Canal 49.99 miles. On the Nicaragua route ships will float in deep water on Lake Nicaragua for a distance of 41.78 miles, and on the Panama route the same advantage will be had for a distance of 7 miles on Lake Bohio. This will leave 141.88 miles of canal navigation on the Nicaragua line and 41.09 miles on the Panama route.

A careful calculation by experts gives the average time for a ship to pass through the Nicaragua Canal as sixty-four and one-half hours, and for the Panama Canal twenty-one hours, being forty-three and one-half hours in favor of Panama.

The Isthmian Canal Commission gives the distance from the termini of the Panama route to New York and San Francisco, respectively, as 498 nautical miles in excess of that by the Nicaragua route.

A calculation will show that any steamer having a speed of 11½ miles per hour will cover that extra distance in the time gained by passing through the Panama Canal, and it is equally certain that Panama is the shorter route to New York and San Francisco for all steamers having a speed of over 11½ knots.

The distance between the Gulf ports and San Francisco to the termini of the Panama route is fixed by the Canal Commission as 700 miles greater by Panama than by Nicaragua. That means that a steamer will have to make 16.1 knots per hour to overcome the increased distance in the forty-three and one-half hours that Panama gains in the transit of the canal.

It follows that from the North Pacific to New Orleans the Panama route is longer for slow steamers, about the same for medium-speed steamers, and shorter for fast steamers. From the North Pacific to New York the Panama route is about the same for slow steamers; it has the advantage for medium-speed steamers and a decided advantage for fast steamers. From the South Pacific to New Orleans and New York the Panama route seems to have the advantage for all kinds of vessels.

Thus it will be seen, Mr. President, that the bugbear as to the increased time of the Panama route vanishes when the additional time required to pass through the Nicaragua Canal is taken into account.

HEALTH CONDITIONS.

But, Mr. President, I did not intend to go into a general discussion of the subject, and will not do so, preferring to leave that to other Senators. My chief purpose in participating in the debate at all is to endeavor to point out that the allegations made against the Panama route on the point of unhealthfulness are not borne out by the record. I do not mean to say that the country which will be traversed by the proposed Panama Canal is a healthy country, but I do wish to be understood as saying that many of the statements made on that point in this debate are contradicted by testimony of the highest possible character.

As an illustration of the extreme statements made, I will cite one that was repeated by the usually accurate Senator from Kansas, when speaking in behalf of the Nicaragua route, which was that every tie on the Panama Railroad represented a human life. That statement has done service for many years as an argument in behalf of the Nicaragua Canal, but evidently no one has taken the trouble to investigate its correctness.

Why, Mr. President, the absurdity of the statement is found in the fact that if every laborer employed on that railroad had died, the number would have fallen 50 per cent short of the ties that were laid. So we will pass that by as a bit of extravagance that has gained credence because of its frequent repetition.

The Senator from Alabama, in a lengthy speech delivered in this Chamber on the 17th of April last, devoted much time to a consideration of the climatic and health conditions of the Isthmus of Panama. He searched both ancient and modern history for material, and I am bound to confess that he presented quite an array of statements to sustain his contention. The Senator also has placed in the RECORD extracts from a book by Wolfred Nelson, entitled "Five Years at Panama," which extracts deal largely with the unhealthfulness of that country.

The Senator from Alabama quoted Mr. Colné as saying that the sum of $680,000 was expended for medicine from 1881 to 1890. As the Senator has denounced with eloquence and vigor the robberies and frauds committed by those who expended the money of the old Panama Canal Company, I wonder he did not assume that very likely these figures were greatly in excess of the real expenditure for medicines. Certain it is, Mr. President, that if that amount of money was spent for medicine the unusual mortality can in part be accounted for on other grounds than that of climatic conditions.

The Senator from Alabama also quoted from the testimony of General Abbot as to the large mortality among the Chinese coolies, but I note in the extract taken from General Abbot's testimony that he says:

The excessive death rate was due, doubtless, not only to the climate, but also to the conditions and to the various races that were tried. It was not then known that the heavy work should be done by negroes. I have no idea—that anything like the mortality then encountered will be repeated on any isthmian line.

Commander Lucien Young's deposition was also used by the Senator from Alabama. Commander Young was very emphatic in his condemnation of the health conditions of the Isthmus of Panama, and to fortify his position he declared that—

So far as yellow fever is concerned, I would rather be in Havana than in Panama.

I wonder that it did not occur to the distinguished Senator from Alabama, when he introduced that testimony into his speech of two months ago, to call attention to the fact that in a few months yellow fever was stamped out in Havana by simple methods well known to the medical profession of the present day, which methods are as applicable to Panama or Colon as to Havana or any other city where yellow fever has heretofore found a habitat.

The simple, plain truth is that the Panama Railroad was built and the construction of the Panama Canal commenced without any adequate means having been provided to safeguard the health of the people. The soil was disturbed and innumerable disease germs were thus set free, precisely as they will be if the Nicaragua Canal shall be built; but it is safe to predict that if either canal is constructed the health authorities of this country will see to it that every known scientific expedient is put in operation to protect the workmen from contracting disease, and that every possible hygienic and sanitary law will be invoked in their behalf, and that means an entirely different condition of things from what prevailed when the Panama Railroad was constructed.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE STORY.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to give the other side of the story, which has not, as yet, figured in this discussion.

It has been my privilege to intimately know two men who spent many years on the Isthmus, and with whom I have frequently talked about the climatic and health conditions. Those men have frequently assured me that there is no more danger there from epidemic or contagious diseases than in any other tropical climate, and they asserted that there was very little danger, if proper precautions were exercised. Sustaining this view, I chanced to see in the Washington Post a short time ago the following:

"There is nothing in all this talk about the bad climate of Panama," said Mr. F. Mutis Duran, of that city, at the Shoreham last night. "It is true that many deaths from fever occurred when the first canal company was at work in Panama, but the deaths were the result of the carelessness of the men. Frenchmen came to a tropical climate and thought they could live there just as they were accustomed to live in Paris. They stayed out in the night air, and paid no attention to the laws of health. If they had done the same thing in any other tropical country they would have died.

I have lived in Panama sixteen years, and know what I am talking about. All my life has been spent in tropical countries, and I know that the climate of Panama is as good as the climate of Cuba. There are fevers in the Tropics which must be guarded against all the time. If the United States decides to build the Panama Canal, it will be found that a little care will be all that is necessary to protect workmen against the maladies peculiar to the Tropics.

That seems to be good testimony, which I commend to those who have found nothing but disease and death in the climate of Panama.

Indeed, Mr. President, this very day a citizen of New Hampshire who is thoroughly familiar with conditions on the Isthmus assured me that the soil along the line of the Panama Canal has almost entirely been removed, thus minimizing future dangers from disease necessarily engendered by soil disturbance, and the same gentleman assured me that there are 10,000 well-acclimated laborers immediately available for work on the canal—men who are practically immune to the climatic diseases of the Isthmus.

Mr. President, medical men know that there will be sickness and death in the construction of an interoceanic canal no matter which route is adopted, but in my opinion there will be little difference between Panama and Nicaragua. I have in my hand an interesting book entitled "Notes on the Nicaragua Canal," by Henry Isaac Sheldon. It is an able plea for a canal by the Nicaragua route, and every possible argument is presented in behalf of the author's views, yet in an addenda to his book he is forced to modify his statements regarding climatic diseases as follows:

Some objections have been offered to the views contained in the first edition of this volume as to the favorable climatic conditions in Nicaragua which in fairness should now be mentioned. In discussing the subject with me, men of experience, conversant with the effects of excavation in Alabama and other Southern States, when extensive local construction was in progress, have insisted that it will be impossible to conduct canal construction in Central America without encountering a great deal of malarial fever. I give also the comments of Sir Leader Williams, made in London in July, 1897:

"Your views about the health of the men when working in Nicaragua are too cheerful. Wherever earth has been made by decaying vegetation, and you turn that earth up to the sunlight, fever germs will escape, and you will have malaria. These germs hold their life indefinitely, like the grains of wheat for centuries in the hands of the mummy in Egypt. I had fever among the men when digging the Manchester Canal, and that was in the heart of England. Your engineers and your contractors must expect sickness in the construction camps in Nicaragua, and suitable allowance for it should be made in all the estimates and contracts."

Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama introduced some extracts from the testimony of Gen. Henry L. Abbot, which I beg to supplement with other statements made by that same distinguished gentleman. In his testimony before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, March 4, 1902, General Abbot said:

There are two other subjects which I think are worthy of the attention of the committee—the health question and the river Chagres.

Nobody claims that the climate of Panama or of any tropical region is conducive to health for natives of more northern climes, but the dangers and difficulties at Panama have been enormously exaggerated, and I thought it might be interesting for the committee to have some absolute statistics on which they could depend. When I was at the Isthmus I visited Dr. Lacroisade, who is the medical director of the new canal company hospital at Panama, an admirable hospital built on a high hill back of the city, with fine buildings, and with the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul as nurses.

We saw Dr. Lacroisade and we got from him, in tabular form, a statement covering the whole subject, so far as the canal records go. These statistics are printed in France, but probably they are not known in this country, and I brought them and should like to make them a part of my testimony.

These statistics begin in 1881, when the old company began the work, and extend from that time down to June 30, 1898, when Dr. Lacroisade made the report for us. Since that date I have taken the figures from the annual reports of the board of directors to the general meeting of the company, so that everything I offer is strictly official. * * *

I ask unanimous consent to place the table in the RECORD without reading. It is a very interesting table and I trust Senators will examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The table is as follows:

[b] "This year continues to show reduced disease and death rates, both climatic and total."

Mr. GALLINGER. General Abbot continues:

Dr. Lacroisade's conclusions, after a residence of many years on the Isthmus, are the following:

"The Central American negroes, and especially those of the West Indies, resist its effects best, owing to their better endurance of the direct rays of the sun, to their relative immunity from malarial influences, and to their absolute immunity from the yellow fever. Hindoos, Chinese, and native Africans suffer more and, engaged in hard work, yield readily to beriberi, of which they have brought the germs. Europeans can resist the climate on condition of abstaining from severe manual labor."

"Of 254 officers and agents sent by the old company between January 1, 1881, and August 31, 1883, and thus exposed to the early conditions, 40 died, indicating a percentage per annum of 7.20. Of the 89 agents sent by the new company in the first three and a half years only 3 died." He attributes the undoubted improvement of health on the Isthmus to better accommodations of the laborers, to better drainage, and especially to the fact that the excavations have reached a level below the poisonous emanations of decaying organic matter. The period of serious sickness always to be expected at the beginning of extensive excavations in tropical regions has already been passed at Panama.

"The logical deduction from these facts and figures is that the excessive mortality due to disturbing virgin soil in the Tropics remains to be encountered in Nicaragua, but has been gone through with at Panama, and we may now assume that a normal state of health will prevail there if proper sanitary regulations are enforced. The following figures from a recent official report of Major Gorgas, M. D., upon the health of Havana sustains this view. The average death rate for eleven years was 48 per thousand; the maximum was, in 1897, 106 in a thousand. The minimum was in 1900, when 21 per thousand died. During 1901, 19.56 per thousand died, which the Doctor says 'compares very favorably with leading civilized countries.'"

I wish to add that it does compare very favorably with leading civilized countries. I find that in the District of Columbia for the ten years from 1892 to 1901, inclusive, the death rate was 21.83. The highest was 24.74 and the lowest 19.48. Yet in Havana, where in 1897 there was a death rate of 106 in a thousand, after modern methods were employed to get rid of conditions that give rise to infectious and malarial diseases, the percentage ran down to 19.58, or equal to the lowest death rate in the District of Columbia for the past ten years.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] interrogated General Abbot as follows:

Right there, General, I understand that your judgment is confirmed by these figures and these data, that in the construction of the Nicaragua Canal you would have to go through pretty much the same conditions, in the turning up of the soil, until you reach a depth below which malarial diseases will be induced.

General ABBOT. I have very little doubt of it. The Commission state the same belief in their report; and I think that anyone who is familiar with work in tropical regions knows that as soon as the surface soil is disturbed extensively diseases which did not exist before are likely to be developed. I remember very well in the early days when Illinois was considered a terrible region for chills and fevers.

Senator HANNA. It was, too.

General ABBOT. But that has passed away with the settlement and occupation of the country. I will now give the best information I have been able to obtain on the subject of diseases and death in recent times on the railroad. I will read an extract from a letter from the second vice-president of the Panama Railroad, Mr. Drake: * * *

"I write concerning the mortality in recent years among the employees of the Panama Railroad, to say that upon careful investigation we find that we have a monthly average of 286 men upon our gold pay roll, mostly foreign, about equally divided as to color, and that among the white employees from the United States, resident on the Isthmus during the last five years, there have been 12 deaths from various causes; none, however, from yellow fever, and 1 by suicide." * * *

That gives nine per thousand. Mr. Drake further writes:

"We have an every monthly silver pay roll of 1,450 men, mostly colored, in constant service, which, as the time is divided into half days, is drawn from a force of fully 2,500 men. During the same period of five years there has been no serious epidemic in this force, or abnormal mortality. From among this force there are always patients in the company's hospital on account of disease or accident numbering from 5 to 20, but there are no records in this office as to the exact number of deaths."

It is interesting to note that in November, 1898, almost four years prior to the date of this testimony, General Abbot contributed an article to the Forum, from which I will read a paragraph or two:

The health of the personnel formerly caused trouble, coolies and other races not well suited to hard labor under a tropical sun being employed. With negroes from the British Antilles little difficulty is now experienced. This matter was carefully investigated during the inspection last spring, American engineers and employees on the canal and the Panama Railroad being questioned, the fine hospital near Panama, where the company provides for its sick, being visited, and the views of the medical officers and of the Sisters of Charity, acting as nurses, being obtained. All agreed that the dangers resulting from the climate have been much exaggerated. The surgeon in charge of the hospital, Dr. Lacroisade, who has resided on the Isthmus since 1887, after presenting full statistics covering the sick reports for the past year of a force of about 3,800 agents and laborers under employment, said:

"Among the diseases attributable to the climate the most numerous are simple marsh fevers, which have not occasioned a single death. Two diseases only belonging to the epidemic type have appeared—the beriberi, of which there is no longer any question (it was imported with negro laborers brought from Africa as an experiment and disappeared when they were sent back), and yellow fever. The latter, after having been absent from the Isthmus for at least six years, was imported in 1897 and continued about six months, from March to August, when it again disappeared after very light ravages (only six deaths).

"Thus it can not be considered that this pest is really epidemic on the Isthmus. From the other infectious epidemics, such as variola, typhoid fever, diphtheria, etc., the Isthmus appears to be almost entirely exempt. From the foregoing we may conclude that life on the Isthmus scarcely incurs more dangers than elsewhere, even for Europeans who, after the blacks of the British Antilles, appear to resist the climate best. Residence here would, then, offer nothing alarming were it not for a constant feeling of fatigue and uneasiness due to a temperature always high and an atmosphere saturated with moisture."

There appears, therefore, to be no danger—of serious mortality in the construction of the canal, if due care be taken to benefit by past experience in selecting the laborers.

Says General Abbot—

I find in the report of the minority certain conclusions reached by them from the testimony taken before the committee, a paragraph or two of which I will read:

As to the comparative healthfulness of the regions traversed by the two routes, we consider the advantages in favor of the Panama. The distance is short, being traversed daily by the railroad within a space of three or four hours; the country is open and occupied by man, and the worst conditions of construction are now over. The enormous loss of life on the Panama line occurred at a time twenty years ago, in the first days of canal construction, but continuous work and the natural operations of nature have made the conditions quite free from former perils and now reasonably safe under proper hygienic conditions. The hospital service of the Panama Canal was extravagantly complete, but furnishes unparalleled conveniences and service of this character. The United States, however, will now get the benefit of this lavish but humane use of money.

The mortality records of the company are kept with the the accuracy of a government service, and in the official statement submitted by General Abbot it is conclusively shown that the conditions of health upon the Isthmus are now reasonably safe and not at all unusual or disturbing. At Nicaragua, on the contrary, in a country never traversed by man except for brief survey, the disturbance of the virgin soil is likely to be followed by mortality such as that which prevailed upon the Isthmus of Panama upon the opening of the canal works there, now happily past at the latter place.

From the testimony given before the committee I will read a few paragraphs:

Senator HANNA. Some consideration has been given to the health of the respective localities. It is claimed, and I presume it is true, that during the time of the construction of the Panama route there has been a great deal of sickness from fever and from other causes along the route of the Panama Canal. Has that been entirely owing to the fact that it is a more unhealthy part of the Isthmus than any other?

Admiral WALKER. I don't know that it is. The Isthmus was very unhealthy in the early days. There was a great loss of life in building the railroad, and when they first went to work on the canal there was a good deal of sickness; but the surface material, from which the sickness is supposed to come, has been largely removed, and of late years it has been as healthy there as anywhere in a tropical country.

Senator HANNA. Is it not likely that in the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, working a large force, turning up the surface of the soil, and in dredging, that malarial conditions conducive to fevers would arise?

Admiral WALKER. Certainly. As it stands to-day Nicaragua is a healthier route, because there is no work of that kind being done and very few people to get sick, but when you get to turning up the ground there will be sickness there, as there would be anywhere.

Mr. NOBLE. As far as present conditions are concerned—that is, present sanitary conditions—I think the advantage is altogether in favor of Nicaragua. Now, when work is undertaken on either route the conditions will be less favorable, owing to the stirring up of the mud in the swamps and the soil; stirring up the soil anywhere will increase the sickness beyond a doubt.

Senator HANNA. On the Nicaragua route?

Mr. NOBLE. On the Nicaragua route or anywhere else. I wish to state that when extensive work was undertaken on the Croton watershed for the water supply of New York some years ago—a peculiarly healthful situation, one would think—there was a great deal of malaria, although it had not been known before.

I should think that as the unfavorable conditions developed the aggravation would be greater, perhaps, in Nicaragua than in Panama, and what the total result would be under the new conditions I am not by any means certain, though I think the advantage would still be with Nicaragua.

Mr. MORISON. I think the diseases at Panama are very largely due to artificial conditions. The Isthmus of Panama has always been an unhealthy place. It has been inhabited for four hundred years, and I think you may say that there is not a water pipe or a sewer on the whole Isthmus. The city of Panama has never had so bad a reputation for sickness as Santiago de Cuba, and we know what has been done at Santiago de Cuba. I think that we know now how to handle sanitary conditions at Panama. * * * The first thing to do on the Isthmus is to get a supply of good water. There is plenty of good water on the Isthmus, but the people do not have it; and the next thing is to dispose of their sewage. With those two conditions met, three-fourths of the sickness on the Isthmus will disappear.

Colonel HAINS. In regard to sanitary conditions, I think the advantages are decidedly with Nicaragua. The men that we had employed in Nicaragua, some of whom were there for a couple of years, were sick very little. There was very little sickness among them. I do not think the health of the men in Nicaragua was as poor as you would find it in many places in the United States.

Senator HANNA. How would it be when you commenced your digging and stirring up the primitive soil and the decayed vegetation.

Colonel HAINS. Well, there is generally an impression that it will create different conditions. I am inclined to think that the conditions even then will be in favor of Nicaragua, because on the east side, where the most troublesome work and the great mass of the work is, the rains are so heavy. While these rains are detrimental to construction, I think they are beneficial so far as hygienic considerations are concerned, and I think so far as the considerations of sanitary conditions are concerned the advantages are with Nicaragua.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Panama, according to testimony here, is a very much more unwholesome climate than Nicaragua?

Mr. BURR. I do not think so, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, taking the facts as they exist—not conjectures, but the facts as they exist, the data we have—did you come to the conclusion that Nicaragua was more unhealthy than Panama?

Mr. BURR. No; not more. I do not think there is any difference between them that is sensible. There is at Panama a great deal of sickness at the present time, many deaths, and there have been in the past; but it is a line of continuous population from one ocean to the other and with one or two great centers of population. It is situated upon converging currents of travel along which many people from infected places are constantly passing.

There is absolutely nothing done there that makes for public health, and you have the natural results of the constant presence of yellow fever and other tropical fevers and ailments belonging to such conditions, whereas on the Nicaragua route there is nobody there to be sick. The Nicaragua route from Greytown to Brito is practically an uninhabited country. There is a small population at Greytown, and steamships call there occasionally, and there is a little business, but it is practically shut off from the outside world.

The little place of Castillo, approximately halfway from Greytown to the lake, has a few people, constituting an isolated population. Fort San Carlos has a small population. I suppose that perhaps 500 people at each one of those places would probably cover all the inhabitants. Outside of that there is nothing in the way of population on the whole route from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific; but there have been dreadful epidemics of yellow fever in Nicaragua in times past, as at Leon. From the accounts given of it there can be little or no doubt that it was yellow fever, and they have at Managua at the present time fevers which I was assured by Dr. Donaldson, the United States consul, are yellow fever, or something just as bad. * * *

I believe that if a large force of laborers were put upon the Nicaragua Canal for its construction, and there were brought into that country the seeds of disease that have been brought into Panama, there would be practically the same conditions to deal with at one place as in the other. It is equally malarial, naturally. The death rate of Nicaragua, so far as anybody can know anything about it, at Managua and other Nicaraguan towns, is appallingly high. In fact, Dr. Donaldson himself had to move out of the house in Managua, where he was living with his family, up into the suburbs on higher ground in order to save himself from illness.

Colonel ERNST. The healthfulness of the Nicaragua line is better than that of the Panama line, but I am not at all satisfied that we can not very much improve the state of affairs on the Panama line with our modern appliances and with the lessons that we have been taught, the necessity of it, and I would not venture to go into the Nicaragua line without taking equal precautions. I think it is absolutely necessary to have a rigid sanitary system there, with a police system to enforce the rules, and to introduce a copious water supply and take all the sanitary precautions that are necessary in those unhealthy countries. They are both unhealthy; there is no doubt about that.

I find likewise in the testimony given before the committee that Mr. Edward A. Drake and Mr. Charles Paine gave some interesting facts. They have been in charge of construction work on the Isthmus for many years. Mr. Drake said:

We have a gold pay roll and a silver pay roll. The gold pay roll represents the employees who are selected here and sent down there, who reside there, with their families, in the company's quarters. And I should like to say, and I should like to have it recorded, that, although much is said of the nonsalubrity of the Isthmus, during the last five years we have had among that colony of our employees, among those whom we sent there, but twelve deaths.

The CHAIRMAN. Twelve deaths among your employees?

Mr. DRAKE. Among our employees sent from the United States. We have a total of gold pay-roll employees sent from here and on the Isthmus of 338.

I will pause, Mr. President, to say that a death rate of 12 out of a total of 338 in the period of five years is a remarkably small death rate for any city in the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. That was only on the gold pay roll, though.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but it is a remarkably low death rate for any class of people anywhere. Mr. Drake, who was a responsible man, testifies that it is a fact.

Mr. PAINE. Those are on the gold pay roll?

The CHAIRMAN. And how about the silver pay roll?

Mr. DRAKE. The silver pay roll represents the natives. There are 338 on the gold pay roll, and among them we have had 12 deaths in the last five years, and only part of these due to climatic causes.

The CHAIRMAN. How about the silver pay roll?

Mr. DRAKE. The silver pay roll is made up of natives. There are 1,387 of them. It is made up of Jamaicans and of people who live in the Tropics, and very naturally are exempt from diseases due to the climate.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the proportion of death among them?

Mr. DRAKE. We have not that record. That is not furnished to us.

Mr. PAINE. There have been no epidemics since I have been there.

Mr. DRAKE. I have been connected with the railroad for fourteen years, and during that time we have had no epidemics.

The CHAIRMAN. You have kept no record of deaths on the silver pay roll?

Mr. DRAKE. The silver roll are natives. It would be keeping the statistics of the towns there. It is easy to obtain, but they live there. We employ them and discharge them, and there is a constant coming and going.

I find further along in the testimony that the chairman asked Mr. Paine:

Have you any statement of the health of your employees, the railroad employees, including the hirelings, the day laborers?

Mr. PAINE. We have no health reports with regard to any of our silver employees; that is, the men who are paid in silver, the natives and Jamaicans that we have there, except such as are in our hospital. We have a report every week showing the condition of the hospital, and generally we have from three to six or seven black men in the lower ward.

The CHAIRMAN. They are the silver men?

Mr. PAINE. They are the black men.

The CHAIRMAN. The silver men are on your silver roll?

Mr. PAINE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. They are the day laborers?

Mr. PAINE. Yes; that is, a force of—well, last month we had——

Mr. DRAKE. One thousand three hundred and seventy-eight.

Mr. PAINE. Those are the days' work—1,378 men continuously for a month. That would mean one-half more men who are really employed: that is, they only work about half time, less than half time, I should say, that the Jamaicans average. We have a force of 300 men paid in gold, and very often there are none of them in the hospital, and sometimes there are as many as five at once. I do not remember any instance where there were more.

Again, Senator KITTREDGE asked Mr. Paine:

What about the general sanitary condition all along the Panama Railway?

Mr. PAINE. There has never been any epidemic since I have been connected with the company; no epidemic of any kind. They have had yellow fever in Panama among the troops, but I do not know of a single instance of yellow fever among our men, among our employees, or among those of the canal company, except one, and that was a doubtful case. He was our agent at La Boca and Panama—Captain Beers. He had had yellow fever before, and he said that he did not have it at this time, but his physician pronounced it yellow fever, seemingly because it was convenient. That is the only case I have ever known among our employees.

The engineer in chief of the Panama Canal Company condensed much truth in a few words when he said in a recent publication:

The passage through the Nicaragua Canal, which will last a day and a half if navigation is possible during the night (a thing which many competent men consider impossible), and which will last three days if navigation is really impossible at night, will bring passengers and crew into contact with the land, and this will facilitate the communication between ships and shore of different diseases, such as smallpox, cholera, yellow fever, etc. The sanitary regulations, quarantine, etc., will cause other risks of detention that ships would not have in a short canal like that of Panama, which can be traversed between sunrise and sunset.

Mr. President, nothing has come to my attention which so completely demolishes the statements of those who have been trying to make it appear that Panama is a pest hole and Nicaragua a salubrious climate as an article in the Medical News of January 4, 1902, from the pen of George A. Soper, Ph. D., of New York City. Dr. Soper is known among scientists as a man of remarkable attainments, and his views on questions of sanitary science carry great weight. Dr. Soper's article is somewhat long, but its great importance will be a sufficient excuse for placing it entire in the RECORD.

Mr. MORGAN. Has the Senator seen the reply of Dr. Stubbert, who was the surgeon of the Maritime Canal Company, to that article?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that I have not.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a very powerful refutation of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish it might have been furnished to me. I know Dr. Soper very well by reputation. He stands very high among the scientists of the country. He has a reputation to sustain, and he has given the country the benefit of this article which has had very great weight on my mind on the question of the relative healthfulness of Panama and Nicaragua. Dr. Soper does not make extravagant claims for Panama, but he seems to have given due weight to every available fact connected with the subject, and his conclusions are a complete refutation of many assertions made in this debate.

I will not read the entire article, but will ask permission to put it in the RECORD. I hope Senators will read it. It will be seen from it that Dr. Soper finds very little difference in the relative healthfulness of the two proposed routes, the advantage, however, being with Panama.

SANITARY ASPECTS OF THE PANAMA AND NICARAGUA CANALS.

[By George A. Soper, Ph. D., of New York.]

The Isthmian Canal Commission, appointed June 19, 1899, to investigate the practicability and feasibility of various projects for constructing a ship canal across the Central American isthmus, have submitted their report to the Congress of the United States. While the matter stands before the representatives of the people and a final choice between routes is still open, it is of interest to inquire from a disinterested standpoint into the conditions which make for and against health in the countries and along the routes which are under consideration.

Upon the question of liability to, or immunity from, disabling diseases rests the problem of labor, and all persons are agreed that the greatest difficulty to be encountered in the construction of the canal will be the procurement of an adequate supply of laborers and the preservation of their health and efficiency. In view of this fact, it is rather curious that the exhaustive report of the Isthmian Canal Commission should not have discussed the question of health more thoroughly. In their report of 263 pages less than a page and a half is devoted to hygiene, and in the 40 appendices which accompany the report there is no discussion of the subject presented.

Not only is the question of health a factor to be considered in the construction of the canal, but when the canal is completed the rôle of this great waterway in promoting or endangering public health will be a subject of immense commercial importance.

General description of the American Isthmus.—The Central American Isthmus in the most extensive meaning is about 1,400 miles long, and extends from the seventy-seventh to the ninety-fifth meridian of longitude and from the eighth to the eighteenth parallel of latitude. The ninth degree of latitude nearly bisects the route of the proposed Panama Canal, while the eleventh parallel cuts that of Nicaragua.

The general direction of the Isthmus is from southeast to northwest, the first 600 miles to the eastward being comparatively small in width. It varies from a minimum of barely 30 miles to a maximum of 120 miles. The land is of volcanic origin and consists of mountain ranges which unite the Andes on the south with the great chain of mountains which extend along the western border of the United States. Below the mountains are many plateaus, plains, and small stretches of land, some of which are but slightly elevated above the level of the sea. The most available routes for a canal across the Isthmus are considered to be the Nicaragua and Panama lines, which would have a length of 183.66 miles and 49.09 miles, respectively.

Most observers writing on the health conditions natural to the low lands of the Isthmus describe the region as unhealthy to the natives and peculiarly fatal to Europeans. Since the period of the Spanish conquest many attempts have been made to colonize Central America, but the foreigners of Spanish extraction are the only ones who have been able to withstand the climate with even a tolerable degree of success. The natives are described as inferior in the social scale, of a wan, sallow tint, with softness and puffiness of the tissues, poverty of the blood, extra large development of the stomach, and with a tendency toward congestion of the liver and speen.

This is accompanied by a state of languor, dullness of the intelligence and of the entire nervous system. Near the sea and along the lines of the proposed Panama and Nicaragua canals much of the land is low and comparatively flat, with sluggish water courses and all the characteristics of a tropical vegetation. Putrid emanations from decomposing organic matters prevail everywhere, and their deleterious effects, considered not as agencies of specific diseases, but more particularly as unwholesome gases, are evident.

The physiological effects often observed in the Tropics prevail on the Isthmus. The large amount of moisture which prevails in the air lessens evaporation from the skin and lungs, and this condition, with the continuous heat, shows its effect in loss of appetite, depression of spirits, and in disorders of the kidneys, stomach, and intestines. In new arrivals the body heat may reach an excess of 1° F. above normal, and frequently exceeds the temperature of the outside air. As a rule, however, the atmosphere is much warmer. This causes the metabolic processes, which in northern climates turn a part of the food materials into heat, to be reversed, and the vital functions are then called upon to neutralize the excess of heat received in order to maintain the body at a normal temperature.

This throws additional work upon the excretory organs, which, under other conditions, would be concerned in throwing off only a portion of the products of the food absorbed. The excess of work and alteration of functions described are important predisposing causes of disease as are the following physiological effects of hot, moist climates: A reduction of the pulse rate, decrease in respiratory action, diminution in the number of red blood corpuscles, increase in perspiration, reduction in saliva, gastric and pancreatic juices and bile.

Health conditions along the Panama route.—At Panama the seasons are divided into two tolerably well-defined periods—the dry or winter and the wet or summer seasons. By this accidental concurrence of the seasons of maximum moisture and maximum heat, the humidity and effluvia from marshes and swamps reaches its greatest possible amount.

For 55 per cent of the time the winds blow from the northeast and northwest, and 35 per cent of the time from the southeast and southwest.

The dry season includes the months of January, February, March, and April, the rainy season occupying the remaining eight months of the year. During the dry season the average temperature at Colon for six years, 1882-1887, was 79.5° F., with a monthly maximum of 90.9°, which occurred in January, and a monthly minimum of 68.4°, which was recored for the same month. During the rainy season the maximum average temperature for any month occurred in October, with a record of 91.9° F. The minimum of temperature for any month of the year was 66.9° F., for August.

The hourly variation in temperature is greatest during the dry season, when the change is, on an average, 7° F. between 4 p. m. and 7 a. m. each day. In the rainy season this difference is 5° F.

The humidity at Colon in 1881 was, on an average, 86 per cent during the rainy season and 77 per cent during the rest of the year. Only limited data are available concerning humidity, but the probability is that it is very high at most points on the Isthmus. As the climate of this insular country depends partly upon the influence of the sea, the temperature of the water of the Atlantic Ocean and that of the Pacific is interesting. On the line of the Panama Canal the temperature of the Atlantic is generally 9° F. higher than the Pacific in February, with a difference of 1° F. in September. At Colon the mean temperature of the ocean is nearly that of the air, 79.9° F.

The barometric pressure is very uniform, especially in the dry season, from which it appears that severe storms are uncommon; yet northers occur occasionally and severe hurricanes have been known on the Atlantic coast.

As a result of fifteen years' records at Colon, the annual precipitation in inches which was measured reached a maximum of 154.89, with a minimum of 116.36 and a mean of 130.20. Rainfall records for four years at Panama show a maximum of 84.73 inches, a minimum of 45.59 inches, and an average of 63.77 inches per year. At Culebra the records for three years showed the rainfall per year varied from 64.25 to 98.97 inches.

As to the forms of disease most commonly met with, Griswold says that four-fifths of all sickness at Panama are due to fevers. Severe bilious fevers, congestive fevers, and Chagres fever are not uncommon. According to Buel, the most sickly period is September, October, and November, during which time dysentery is very common, as is also a high degree of bilious fever which, in malignity and fatality, falls little short of yellow fever. Foreigners seldom, if ever, acquire the same immunity from local diseases as that enjoyed by the natives; they are frequently attacked by febrile disorders, and in the interim suffer from the depressing and debilitating effects of the climate. In March, April, and May fevers are at their minimum. Dysentery is common at the end of the rainy season and at the beginning of the dry season. Phthisis is prevalent among the natives, especially along the coasts. According to Wallis, "smallpox, yellow fever, and paludal fevers in their infinite varieties and forms are never absent in these intertropical regions, where they are truly endemic." Nelson, after an experience of five years at Panama, gives his approval of the statement long made with reference to the Isthmus, that it is the "Grave of the European." It has also been called the "Pest-house of the Tropics," and Bigelow says that here truly "life dies and death lives."

In the contracts let by the old Panama Canal Company the latter was compelled to supply the labor. The total population of Panama was estimated at not above 150,000, and as many thousand workmen were required for the work upon the canal, it was necessary to import labor from abroad. In the effort to supply the demand, many laborers were brought from the island of Jamaica, but of these many soon fell sick and died, and a large number of the remainder left the work to escape a similar fate. Other workmen came from Cartagena, the British Antilles, and the Lower Mississippi Valley. Of all the labor employed, the most hardy workers, as regards ability to endure hardship and resist disease, were a tribe of Indians from the Magdalena River.

The sickness and loss of life among the men engaged at work upon the canal has been variously stated. Davidson declares that of a force of 7,000 men, the company reckoned that about 1,000 men were always in hospital. From other sources we learn that the sickness and death rate among the laborers were very high. In Panama and its vicinity 37 engineers out of less than 100 are said to have died during the months of March and April, 1882. An observer declares "there was not a single French engineer who had been able to attend to the work beyond one year and a half, although the contract called for two." In September, 1884, it is said the canal company buried 654 officers and men. There were many sanitary abuses when the canal work was first begun, and the method of charging the contractors for the care of the men in hospital no doubt caused the laborers to be kept at work when they should have been under medical care.

The health conditions, as officially reported by French authorities, do not show the high mortalities from diseases incident to the climate which have been indicated by travelers and other independent observers. But Heffenger declares that it was impossible for him to gain access to the health records of the Panama Canal Company and that the impression gained by him after investigating the matter privately was that the public reports were garbled and incorrect. Dr. Heffenger states that he was informed by a leading physician of Panama that in the first eleven months during which preliminary work on the canal was under way, 65 officers and 800 men died of disease.

It is recorded by Liddell that of 382 patients treated by him between the middle of June and the succeeding May, 250, or more than two-thirds, were suffering from remittent fever with bilious, gastric, or enteric complications. Referring to the importation of labor for the Panama Railroad, Liddell says that the services of laboring men from the United States could not be counted on for three successive months. Before the end of the second month one-half the force was on the sick list or enfeebled by sickness already sustained.

In this connection it is interesting to note that the Panama Railroad Company, which has had fifty years' experience, along the line of the Panama Canal grants to its white employees from the United States two months' vacation every year.

The route of the Panama Canal follows low-lying valleys from the Atlantic terminus to a point within a few miles of the Pacific. Here, at what is known as the Culebra ridge, there is a section of several miles of mountain through which a deep excavation must be cut. It is probable that a large number of laborers would have to occupy the position for eight years. Next in importance are excavations and other work between Culebra and the Pacific.

There is a considerable diversity in the engineering problems connected with the Panama route, but the labor would be comparatively concentrated. Swamps, with the rank vegetation peculiar to the Tropics, abound along most of the line. To the cost of construction the Isthmian Canal Commission has added 20 per cent to cover engineering, police, sanitation, and general contingencies. The same percentage has been allowed for the Nicaragua route. How much would be devoted to sanitation is not stated.

Health conditions along the Nicaragua route.—Some 280 miles north of the Atlantic entrance to the proposed Panama Canal is the city of Greytown, the eastern terminus of the projected route of the Nicaragua Canal. Topographically, the country traversed by the line of the Nicaragua Canal consists of a great central, basin-like depression, inclosed by coastal mountain ranges, whose peaks occasionally attain a height of from 5,000 to 7,000 feet. The Central Basin is occupied by two great lakes, the waters of which flow eastward through valleys which open diagonally to the Atlantic Ocean.

The central depression descends to the Pacific through a short and narrow valley in the western coast range. The route is marked by swamps, lagoons, and river bottoms heavily overgrown with rank tropical vegetation. By far the largest share of the estimated cost of constructing the Nicaragua Canal is allotted to that part of the line which lies east of the lakes. Here are located extensive river and harbor improvements, several locks, and the Conchuda Dam, whose site is between Ochoa and Lake Nicaragua. It is thought that the canal would be eight years in building.

Much less is known about the climate and health conditions of Nicaragua than Panama. According to all sources of information, the temperature is fairly uniform throughout the year. The report of the Isthmian Canal Commission just published states that the thermometer seldom reaches 95° F. nor falls below 70° F. The humidity is usually high, particularly on the eastern slope. As recorded for several stations in 1898 the humidity was never below 58 per cent and generally above 80 per cent. It has been declared that the locality is beyond the cyclonic disturbances of the West Indies and that heavy storms are rare, yet authentic accounts exist which show that northers and other similar atmospheric disturbances have occurred at infrequent intervals along the Atlantic coast. The northeast trade winds predominate.

Rainfall records show that there is no definitely wet nor dry season on the eastern slope, but in the region of Lake Nicaragua and on the west coast there is a distinct dry season from about the 1st of December to the middle of May, during which rain seldom falls. During the dry season the prevailing winds blow from the Atlantic coast and the moisture contained in the atmosphere is precipitated before it reaches the central and western watersheds.

The rainfall at the Atlantic end of the Nicaragua Canal route is the heaviest yet recorded for the American continent. The annual rainfall at Greytown averages 260-270 inches and has twice reached nearly 300 inches. Points at which rainfall was noted in 1900 were: Greytown, 266.10 inches; Ochoa, 158.83 inches, and Fort San Carlos, 89.34 inches. In 1898 the rainfall at San Juan (Greytown) was 201.64 inches; Ochoa, 170.84 inches, and Brito, the Pacific terminal, 94.88 inches. The heaviest recorded fall of rain in a short period occurred at Lake Silico, November 4, 1899, when 10.5 inches fell in six hours, an average of 1¾ inches per hour. On the same date 12.48 inches of rain fell in twenty-four hours at Greytown. A fall of four or more inches per day is not uncommon.

It is the testimony of disinterested observers that both coasts of Nicaragua are malarious, with a considerable amount of suffering from malarial cachexia and enlargement of the spleen. Dysentery is one of the severe diseases of the country. A prevalence of fever of the pernicious type has been noted, particularly in the western portion of the country. The fever is generally hepatic, and jaundice and hematemesis are usually present. The mortality from pernicious fever is very high. As this disease carries so many of the characteristic symptoms of yellow fever, Stitt declares that able physicians frequently pronounce the two diseases to be identical.

Among the diseases not epidemic but prevalent, may be mentioned those of an enteric nature, affections of the liver, such as hyperemia and tropical abscess, intermittent and remittent fevers, and pulmonary tuberculosis. The climate of the lake region is said to be particularly unfavorable to persons suffering from phthisis. The yearly reports made by the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua to the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, convey the impression that the health of the employees engaged upon the canal construction was satisfactory. About 1½ per cent of those actually in hospital died, including the patients who were admitted for the treatment of accidental injuries. About 51 per cent of all cases of sickness were fevers; there were no deaths from enteric diseases, and only two-thirds of 1 per cent of the cases in hospital died of diseases contracted in the country.

Commenting upon the records of the Maritime Canal Company, the Isthmian Canal Commission of 1899-1901 observes that "These operations, however, were of a preliminary character, employing but a limited number of men. It is probable that when 10,000 or 20,000 men are assembled, and the rank soil is being turned up over a widely developed line of works, the experience will be different." There is very little impartial or antagonistic criticism available concerning the health conditions which obtained at the works of the Maritime Canal Company, for very little attention has been given to this project except by Americans who have long been prejudiced in its favor.

Comparison between the Panama and Nicaragua routes.—A comparison of the conditions which make for and against health along the proposed lines of the Panama and Nicaragua canals may be summed up conveniently under the two following heads:

I. Which route would probably be freer from disease during the work of construction?

II. Which canal would be more favorable to health after it was built?

In discussing these topics it will be convenient to note some of the most unfavorable conditions common to both routes and suggest very briefly means by which the rates of sickness and death may be kept as low as practicable.

I. Health conditions during construction.—The greatest difference in climate between the lines of the Panama and Nicaragua canals is in rainfall. Panama has a dry season of four months with a rainy season of eight. No rain at all falls during the winter months, and in the rainy season the precipitation occurs mostly as heavy showers which come on in the afternoon.

On most of the Nicaragua line, particularly at the site of the great dam and about Grey Town, rain falls throughout the year. The immediate effect of the constant rain in Nicaragua is to keep laborers and others exposed to the elements in a drenched condition. Wet clothes taken off at night are put on damp the next morning, and worn so through the day. Sleeping garments removed after a night's rest are placed in rubber receptacles so they may be dry at night. The effect upon health of this constant wetting may be imagined. It is not reasonable that the human system should be able to long stand the debilitating effects which the wet apparel produces. Diseases of the respiratory organs, rheumatism, and fevers are consequently invited by the climatic conditions which occur between the lakes and the Atlantic terminus of the Nicaragua Canal. The western part of the route appears to be very similar to the Panama country so far as climate is concerned.

The range of temperature, so far as the records at hand indicate, is somewhat greater at Nicaragua than at Panama. Daily changes of temperature, however, do not seem to be quite so marked. The humidity is higher, and the soil, by reason of a greater length of low swampy territory along the Nicaragua line, makes the northern route less acceptable than the Panama Canal would be from this standpoint of health.

There is little difference in the nature of the diseases which are indigenous to the countries along the two routes. The history of the Panama Canal country is a black one, but in considering the records of sickness along this route, it must be remembered that grave sanitary errors were committed from the beginning, and that unfavorable accounts, arising probably in some cases from commercial and national prejudices, have been collecting for a long time. The situation is very different with respect to Nicaragua. The country is comparatively new, and no such damage to its reputation has occurred. If it is said that but little disease can be charged against Nicaragua, the reason is probably because little experience of any kind has been had there.

From the evidence at hand it is inferred that dysentery, malarial, and other fevers are as much at home under the conditions of climate and soil which exist at Nicaragua as they are at Panama, and that smallpox and many minor tropical diseases are probably endemic in both countries. The climate in each case predisposes the native and foreigner to sickness and favors the progress of the worst diseases which may be brought into the country.

The ordinary habits of the natives and visitors who stay any length of time on the Isthmus are not calculated to increase bodily vigor and natural resistance to disease. Carelessness to exposure, indifference to obvious dangers of diet, lack of proper attention to bodily irregularities, and a strong appetite for spirituous liquors are conditions which render the people of the Isthmus especially liable to disease.

Following the precedent established by the Suez Canal enterprise and adopted by the promoters of the Panama and Nicaragua canals, a department of health will in all likelihood be organized. The work which will naturally come before this sanitary organization will include the procuring and protection of pure-water supplies, and the prompt and permanent disposition of the daily wastes, which will occur among the thousands of laborers who will be gathered together in camps and settlements. The housing and provisioning of the men will no doubt form a division of the work, as will be the regulation of their hours and habits of toil and recreation. Medical inspections will be required in order to detect the presence of diseases and insanitary conditions, and hospitals, with branches along the line, will be necessary to care for those who will inevitably suffer from accident and sickness. If an arrangement can be made by which the physical condition of the laborers is examined, and perhaps vaccination practiced, before they are allowed to embark from their home ports for the works, the subsequent labor of the sanitary organization will be greatly lightened.

The type of physique which has been found most able to resist the unhealthful conditions of the climate of the Isthmus closely approaches the best types already found there and in the neighboring islands and on the Gulf coast of the United States. The foreigner least susceptible to disease in these tropical countries is a man of medium stature, square frame, dark complexion, thick skin, and mature age.

II. Health conditions after completion of the canal.—The health conditions which are likely to obtain at the canal after its completion are worthy of consideration, since a large population will probably gather along the route and an immense amount of traffic will pass through the great waterway. Tributary to the Nicaragua route there is a naturally rich and extensive country which would be opened up to traffic. On the line of the Panama waterway the country is rugged, sparsely settled, and much less productive. At the present time the population along the Nicaragua route is slight, and cities near its terminals are not yet built. At Panama a railroad which has been established for fifty years nearly parallels the line of the canal. Two well-established cities are situated at the ends of this route.

After the canal is built, infectious diseases will almost inevitably be brought to the people of the Isthmus by the large amount of traffic which will result. Vessels will come from the cholera centers of Hongkong, Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Singapore, and the Straits Settlements; from the plague foci of China, India, and Japan, and from the yellow-fever ports of Brazil, Mexico, and those islands of the West Indies which lie between 61° and 85° west longitude.

Comparing the two routes across the Isthmus from this standpoint, it is plain that the Panama Canal has a very marked advantage over the line which would pass through Nicaragua. It is much shorter. Ships in transit would be able to pass from ocean to ocean by the Panama Canal in twelve hours, while by the Nicaragua Canal thirty-three hours would be consumed. It may be urged that communication with the land in either case could be avoided, and that an efficient sanitary police could effectually protect the people and shipping against mutually communicating disease.

Unfortunately, further thought shows that this would be a difficult matter. The temptation for sailors and others to seek the relaxation of a few hours on shore in the middle of a long voyage and under conditions of a peculiarly alluring nature while the ships are slowly passing through the locks and narrow reaches of the canal is not to be denied. If to this temptation is added the certainty of being able to overtake vessels by railway after a night's debauch it is not clear how the Isthmus can certainly be prevented from becoming a focus of disease as well as a focus of trade.

It is extremely important that this great highway of commerce should be kept entirely free of epidemics of infectious diseases, for the burdens which would be put upon shipping in the event, for example, of cholera becoming prevalent along the canal would go far to offset the advantages to be gained by making the short cut from ocean to ocean; nor would the fact that a vessel had loaded her cargo at a healthy port relieve her from suspicion of carrying disease. It is doubtful if the quarantine officers of any healthy city would admit to pratique a vessel which had passed a day and a half in an infected country, whether the original ports of departure of that ship had been in a healthy condition or not.

Another effect which the opening of the canal is liable to have upon public health will be that due to the improved chances of carrying disease between ports which will be brought nearer together by the canal. The southern ports of the United States and the Pacific coast will be brought in much closer contact with the unhealthy cities of South America and the East by the opening of a transisthmian canal. The obvious remedy here is the cleaning up of these unhealthy centers; but meanwhile the insanitary condition of many of the ports of trade, both in the United States and South America, makes the danger dependent upon a closer and more extensive traffic among them.

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS.

The principal conclusions reached in the foregoing inquiry may be conveniently brought together in the following categorical order:

1. Both the Panama and Nicaragua routes pass through a country which is extremely unfavorable to health.
2. The climate of Nicaragua and Panama differ chiefly with respect to rainfall, the precipitation on the Panama route being distinctly the less unfavorable to health.
3. Considerations of soil, topography, and the nature of the engineering work to be done are in favor of Panama. Fewer men would be required; they would be concentrated, and hence their health could be more easily protected.
4. There is practically no difference in the nature of the diseases to be anticipated, nor in the precautions to be taken to protect health in either case.
5. After construction the difficulty of controlling health conditions along the line would be greater on the Nicaragua route.
6. The shorter Panama route would cause passing vessels to be exposed to the possibilities of infection for a much briefer interval. The danger of communicating diseases to and from the Isthmus is fairly represented by the difference in time which it would take ships to pass from ocean to ocean by the two routes.
7. The likelihood of the canal becoming a disease focus, thus interfering with commerce, by requiring all healthy ports to quarantine against ships passing the Isthmus, is much greater in the case of Nicaragua than Panama.
8. Although the Panama health records are much darkened by heavy losses of life by disease, this is not to be construed as evidence of the existence of conditions favoring a greater immunity from sickness along the Nicaragua line. More lives have been lost at Panama because more lives have been unnecessarily exposed. The experience of Panama is to be taken as a warning of conditions which are liable to be repeated on either route.
9. Whichever canal is selected extraordinary care will be required to maintain satisfactory health conditions during construction and after completion of the work.
10. Plans and preparations in detail for the organization of an efficient sanitary and medical department should be made as early as possible, so that the measures necessary for the prevention of disease may be carried on in harmony with the engineering projects.

Now, Mr. President, on this matter of health conditions in Panama and Nicaragua I have only to add that the United States Government is fully equipped with a service that will care for these malarial and infectious diseases wherever they exist under our control. We have stamped out yellow fever in Santiago de Cuba. We have stamped out yellow fever in Havana, a city that one of the witnesses of the Senator from Alabama pictured as being as bad as Panama. We have stamped out these epidemics wherever they have prevailed in our own country; and in my opinion we are fully prepared, if we construct a canal either along the Nicaragua or the Panama route, to stamp out the diseases which proved so disastrous to human life when the Panama Railroad was constructed, at which time all the laws of life and health were absolutely disregarded.

INTERESTING STATISTICS.

Mr. President, in connection with this subject it is interesting to recall the fact that in former years, before it was thought necessary to have clean streets, good sewerage, pure water, and efficient medical supervision, fearful epidemics of yellow fever and cholera were not unknown to Northern cities.

In 1699 yellow fever raged in Philadelphia, and again in 1762.

In 1793 5,000 deaths occurred in Pennsylvania from yellow fever.

In 1792 the same disease carried off 1,792 people in Philadelphia, and in 1798 3,645 deaths occurred from the same scourge in that city.

In the years 1702, 1790, 1794, 1795, 1798, 1805, 1822, and 1867 yellow fever prevailed in New York City, some years to an alarming extent.

In 1832 there were 4,000 deaths from cholera in New York City, and in 1849 3,000 deaths. The same year there were 2,000 deaths from cholera in Buffalo, 5,080 deaths in Boston, and the epidemic raged in Michigan, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Missouri, Tennessee, and Illinois.

Those scourges are now unknown to the Northern States, and they are practically stamped out in the South, just as they can be in Nicaragua or Panama.

But, Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended to, and I leave the subject for the consideration of others, contenting myself with the closing remark that the great natural advantages of the Panama route should not be abandoned because of the false cry that has been raised as to health conditions along that line. The preponderance of testimony refutes the arguments that have been made on the other side, and justify us in the conclusion that the climatic conditions of Panama are not such as should deter this Government from selecting that route as the most feasible one for an interoceanic canal.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, if Panama has been the subject of a false cry about its healthfulness, it is the worst slandered country in the world, because I have never yet heard a person speak about it, I have never seen a newspaper that wrote about it that did not say it was the unhealthiest country in the world. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] may have entirely overturned all that history has recorded on that subject, but I think I must content myself on that point by referring to the unanimous opinion of mankind, a judgment based on facts that are absolutely unanswerable, perhaps one of the leading and best authorities being Baron von Humboldt, who said it was the only place where, for fifty years, yellow fever had appeared at any isthmian port, and where it was continuous and immovable. We know that that is so.

Mr. President, I do not wish to appear in this debate as frequently as I am compelled to do, but a great amount of care, labor, and responsibility have been thrown upon me, and I am compelled in honor and in conscience to bring forward for the consideration of the Senate the facts which have not appeared in the history of this measure, except in certain papers and records that have been submitted here and in the testimony of witnesses, without proper arrangement.

I desire this evening to bring forward for discussion a situation that has been created by the act of the President of the United States. The last time I was on the floor I read a statement from General Grant, after he was President, which showed that he had made a very careful examination of both these routes, taking up the report made by Humphreys, Ammen, and others, to which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] referred this morning. His statement on that subject, it occurred to me, contained as much good sense as was ever contained in any proposition made by mortal man, and it is not at all unnatural that we should attribute such sensible things to General Grant.

Mr. President, I claim to have a proper respect for the solemn diplomatic acts, pledges, and agreements of our Presidents, without reference to the politics of their supporters or my political antagonisms toward them. It is on this basis that I rest the hope and the belief that the action of President McKinley in the conduct of a great and dangerous imbroglio in China, and the conclusion he reached of which we know little, officially, is honorable, just, correct, benevolent, wise, and patriotic. I have equal respect for the motives and the conduct of President McKinley in obtaining the agreements from Costa Rica and Nicaragua in December, 1900, that are called protocols, which have only been laid before Congress officially within a month past.

I honor him for the correct, just, benevolent, wise, and patriotic terms of those agreements and for the friendly regard for our sister Republics, Costa Rica and Nicaragua, in which those agreements had their origin, and for the splendid and intrepid statesmanship that inspired them. A more trying and difficult group of questions was never dealt with or answered in the clear mind and true heart of a courageous man than was settled in this simple act of quiet, firm, and wise resolve by President McKinley.

The first question in that difficult problem was: "Shall a canal be opened through the American isthmus or shall the effort be abandoned?" The answer was: "It shall be opened."

"At what place?" was the next question. The answer was: "Through the valley of the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua." "Who shall construct, own, and control the canal?" The answer was: "The United States."

In what way and by what authority shall the right be obtained to do these acts that are little less than sovereign? The answer was, "By agreement with the sovereign Republics that own the country. They are our younger sisters, and in the sense of the protection we owe them through our national relations toward them they deserve our most respectful consideration, our most honorable care, our most neighborly assistance in the one great work which alone can bring these great Republics within reach of the distant coasts of the Atlantic and the Pacific, a work which the Creator has provided them the opportunity to accomplish—through lakes and rivers that only a slight diversion will cause to flow to the westward, as they now flow to the eastward, and connect the two oceans—without the strength to do the work."

The last and most trying question that arose was, Who shall prevent or hinder the performance of this plain duty?

To that question it was the soul of the American President that responded, not alone his wisdom or his courage. "No nation under the sun shall prevent us," was the answer of President McKinley.

While the Senate and Congress were in strenuous debate as to the true line of duty toward Great Britain in this connection, Mr. McKinley settled it by agreements with these States, then he signed, sealed, and delivered, to become effectual when Congress should give its consent. He did not, as the Spooner amendment does—I speak of the one before the Senate—first declare that Congress shall decide on the route, and it shall afterwards be ratified by the Senate, acting on a treaty by a two-thirds vote. As to the Executive, the lines of duty were fixed in those agreements. The President believed that Congress should authorize them to be made. I fully agree with the President.

There were still other embarrassments that he encountered. The chief of these was the artful, persistent, and intrusive overtures and supplications of the Panama Canal Company, assisted by its powerful allies, the transcontinental railroads. The entire group, in one solid agreement, which included all the railroads from the Canadian Pacific to the Panama Railroad, brought all their power to bear upon the President, and have never ceased their opposition to these agreements. He stood firm while life lasted.

Further on in my observations I will trace the insidious course of the Panama Canal Company, that never pursued any course which did not leave in its trail the marks of disaster and the stain of discredit. Mr. McKinley knew its odious history as well as any man that lived, and he despised it as thoroughly. He learned these things from the watchful scrutiny that was his habit and is the safeguard of all honest public servants. He had studied the report of the committee of which Hon. John R. Fellows was the chairman, dated March 3, 1893, made to the House, of which Mr. McKinley was then a member, and he knew the story of peculation and bribery and of the monopolistic agreements of the Panama Canal Company, laid bare in that document, and how its most distinguished promoter had stated his anxiety to quickly obtain and earn his salary by "putting the Nicaraguans on their backs," as he declared.

That was while De Lesseps was in the full tide of his glory and was permitting hundreds of millions of French money to be squandered in corrupt contracts. And it was during the time that the American committee of the Panama Canal Company were the dispensers of French money in Washington. Mr. McKinley had even been worried and badgered by Cromwell and other agents of that company by letters thrust upon him that I will presently read to the Senate.

He knew of the passage of the bills in the Senate for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal and of the hearings and report of the Hepburn committee to the House of Representatives, in January, 1899, in which the whole subject of the merits of the Panama Canal was gone into, and he knew of the passage of the Hepburn bill in the House, in May, 1900, from which he copied the very language of the agreement of December, 1900.

He knew of the report of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, of May 16, 1900, of which the Senator from Ohio was a member, and that the committee denounced the Panama Canal Company in the terms which I will now quote and in other censures of like character.

That committee reported thus:

This manifest purpose of this company to interfere with legislation, by asking the President to inform Congress of a state of facts, as alleged, of which Congress is "presumably without knowledge," is an insult to the intelligence of Congress. It is an insolent invitation to the President to control the action of Congress so that they shall not act upon bills reported by committees in both Houses and "to be acted upon in the House of Representatives May 1 and May 2, 1900, having for their purpose the adoption by the Government of another isthmian canal route, without awaiting the recommendation of the President and the information, report, and conclusions of the Isthmian Canal Commission appointed by the President under the act of March 3, 1899."

It is a spectacle that is, happily, without precedent, that this foreign corporation, acting in a foreign country and without any recognition even of the honesty of its dealings, while it has all the time been the subject of distrust by our Government, should ask the President to "advise the Congress of the facts of the case" for the purpose of opposing Congress in declaring and enforcing the public policy of our people and Government.

A bill that the House had agreed to consider on the 1st and 2d days of May, 1900, is severely censured by this speculating corporation, because its passage would destroy the hope of that company of unloading a failing enterprise upon the United States under its proposal of February 28, 1899, which is again renewed in this letter.

Aside from the fact that said proposal contains suggestions that provide for the robbery of the stockholders of the "old company" and the violation of the decrees of the courts of France, it proposes a direct violation of the statutes of Colombia, enacted in granting the concessions to that company, and a breach of our treaty of 1846 with Colombia, which binds us to guarantee the sovereignty of that territory over the State of Panama.

The President has never answered said overture, nor has he responded to the suggestions and requests contained in the letter from Sullivan & Cromwell of April 30, 1900, but the Secretary of State has sent that letter to the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals in a communication as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 14, 1900.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
Chairman Committee on Interoceanic Canals,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a letter addressed to the President by Messrs. Sullivan & Cromwell, general counsel for the New Panama Canal Company, expressive of the desire of the company that no action be taken by Congress upon the subject of an interoceanic canal between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans until the Isthmian Canal Commission, constituted under the act of March 3, 1899, shall have completed its investigations and inquiries and reported to the President.

The company's letter of February 28, 1899, referred to by Messrs. Sullivan & Cromwell, is printed on page 41 of Senate Document No. 188, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, but a copy is herewith inclosed for more convenient reference.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

(Inclosures:) Letters from Sullivan & Cromwell, February 28, 1899, and April 30, 1900.

The committee made further declarations in that report which will be a source of pride to its members while they live and will do them honor in their graves. They say:

As the question of the building of the canal is not dependent upon any doctrine relating to the freedom of the seas, or its neutrality, or its use as a feature of military strategy, delay in its construction, which may be fatal to its success, should not be the policy of Congress.

Delay in construction can not possibly advance the settlement of any question as to the use of the canal after it is completed.

Such questions are convenient pretexts for delay on the part of those who oppose the work of the construction, ownership, and control of the canal by the United States because they own competitive routes of interoceanic transportation, or by those who wish to place the control of this vast source of wealth and power in the hands of syndicates of private persons; but the duty of Congress, in response to the will of the people so universally expressed, is that we should provide the means for instituting this great work, and that we should enable the President, as the Chief Executive and as the head of the diplomatic department, to proceed to do what is needful and proper to be done to inaugurate the canal. This bill provides such authority, yet it makes the President subject to the future power of Congress or the Senate, as he may find it best to proceed by agreement or by treaty in its execution.

The attitude of the American people, as it is presented in this bill, is at once proud, independent, self-reliant, and honorable, while it is properly considerate of all international obligations that may be justly demanded of our Government. It declares the right that belongs to our great Republic to provide for the general welfare of our people in the way that Congress shall provide, without nervous apprehension that any nation will find in our action any just ground of complaint or any reasonable criticism of the decisive promptitude of our determination.

There is no actual cause for such apprehensions, and the indulgence or the expression of them does not comport with the past history or the character of our people.

Believing that all other nations will regard our course in pursuing this vital duty to our country with the consideration that is due to the pressure of this great subject upon the attention of Congress, our true and self-respecting line of action is clear. It is that Congress will now provide the means and the authority for constructing a ship canal in Nicaragua and Costa Rica, with their consent, and leave it to the President, under the Constitution, to deal with any questions of a diplomatic sort that may be made by other nations in the progress of his work.

Our plainest duty, after this bill becomes a law, is to agree with Nicaragua and Costa Rica as to the terms on which they will concede to the United States the right to build, own, and control a canal through their territories, and to arrange with them the terms and conditions under which the canal shall be used by the contracting powers and by other nations. When these conditions are thus settled by the powers that have the first and best right to settle them, a basis will be established on which further negotiations can be conducted with all other powers as to the privileges they shall enjoy in the use of the canal.

Until this is done no such just basis can exist.

Mr. McKinley did not wait for the passage of the first Hepburn bill to accept this suggestion in this statement of the committee. He proceeded in advance of it to secure the necessary rights from Costa Rica and Nicaragua, by the agreements of December 1, 1900, and which, when they are obtained, fix every right positively, but leave the details, the plans, and the compensation, if any, to be determined by treaty with these powers upon the basis of that agreement. That is what we ought to do now and ought to have done long since. Colombia has never proposed to make such an agreement with us, and she can not possibly propose to do it, because her constitution requires that any contract that she makes with a foreign government shall be first authorized by her congress.

Whatever the Senator from Ohio may think of Mr. McKinley, I feel deeply grateful to him for having taken his line of action in December, 1900, in precise accord with the foregoing declarations of the committee, even to the copying of the text of the Hepburn bill into the agreements with Nicaragua and Costa Rica, in December, 1900.

After that report was made, and up to the date of the report of the minority of the committee made on the 31st day of May, 1902, which was signed by the Senator from Ohio, that committee has uniformly and earnestly supported and defended the wise and patriotic course of Mr. McKinley in signing the agreements of December, 1900, with Costa Rica and Nicaragua, without any hint of dissent.

What reason or occasion can now be found for abandoning and scouting this great act is more than I possess the power to discern, and no reason is stated by the minority of the committee. The Senate has found it necessary and proper to rely upon the judicial fairness of the reports of its committees in order to get along with the public business. When objections exist of a grave character to a diplomatic agreement such as this, signed, sealed, and delivered between the parties, it is due by any committee or any part of a committee that departs from that agreement to state some reason for it.

Until this minority report came in no one questioned the propriety or the binding force of those agreements, or that Mr. McKinley was trifling with so serious a matter when he made them. What has aroused this new and sudden opposition to these honorable agreements I can not quite understand.

The facts that enter into the proper consideration of this great canal question are so numerous that it is scarcely possible in a report to present them in detail or even approximately. The Senate, unless it finds that its confidence is betrayed, is ready to accept the conclusions of its committees as presenting the honest opinions of their membership, at least for what they are worth.

As no dissent has ever been expressed by a member of the committee of this action of President McKinley in making these agreements with Costa Rica and Nicaragua, and it has been often referred to and commented upon in its reports, it seems to me that it is entitled to the respect of the members of the committee, however it may be regarded by others.

The Hepburn bill confirms those agreements, while the Spooner substitute destroys them.

When history makes up its records of the acts of the contemporaries of William McKinley, it will be found that no true Democrat has helped to destroy this wise, brave, and patriotic deed, performed in the quiet manner that is always characteristic of true greatness.

Mr. President, when the Committee on Interoceanic Canals reported the House bill now before the Senate, the drafts of the conventions proposed for our consideration by Colombia, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica had not been sent to Congress, and the committee, after earnest effort to ascertain what would be the cost of the concessions of the respective Governments, failed to gain that information. Consequently it had no basis of fact as to the cost of the two canals on which it could make a recommendation.

The result was that the committee made no report except to recommend the passage of the House bill, for reasons that are aside from the cost of the concessions and are far more important, which have been stated to the Senate without dissent in the previous reports of the committee. So the committee reported the bill to the Senate, along with the hearings and without repeating its former reports, the conclusions of which the evidence on the hearings still more fully sustained.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] afterwards offered a bill which was referred to the committee and was carefully considered.

In the meantime the proposed convention of Colombia and Nicaragua and a statement of the attitude of Costa Rica had been sent to Congress for information by the Secretary of State.

It was then possible to have a view of the subject that would include nearly every possible phase of the question of the choice of the routes, and the committee was enabled on Mr. HOAR'S bill to state its reasons more fully for recommending the Nicaragua route. In doing this the committee made some comments on the attitude of Colombia and Nicaragua, as it is shown by their drafts of the proposed convention, which I do not now propose to repeat. But I respectfully ask that Senators will examine them.

Since December, 1900, the Committee on Interoceanic Canals have earnestly and carefully urged the passage of the House bill, of which Hon. William P. Hepburn is the author, because of its wise adaptation to the existing conditions at the time it was offered, and its still more appropriate application to conditions as they now exist.

That bill provides for the conditions on which the "protocols" of December, 1900, as the agreements were called, are to become fully obligatory, and this is its vital principle and most essential provision. If there are imperfections as to any matter of administration, they can be corrected hereafter without endangering the provisions for creating the canal.

These agreements fully define the obligations that Costa Rica and Nicaragua are ready to assume and execute as to a canal on the Nicaragua route, and the Hepburn bill accepts them as they are stated in these protocols. Such acceptance is a final disposition of several points in the situation that can not be settled with Colombia, under her constitution, except by act of her Congress to authorize the making of such an agreement.

The chief of these agreements are the definition of the canal route and canal zone, the terminals, and the perpetual and exclusive ownership and control of the canal. Other important matters are settled by those agreements finally, and the further details of the plan of execution are left to be arranged by future negotiation.

The passage of the Hepburn bill will create final relations with Costa Rica and Nicaragua on these points, which are vital to the canal. The passage of the Spooner bill would only authorize the President to open negotiations with Colombia, and will, if it is not amended, adopt the draft of the proposed convention at least as a guide to the President in acquiring canal rights in Colombia.

The report of the committee on the bill of Senator HOAR states its reasons for refusing to recommend the convention proposed by Colombia, and again presents reasons for the passage of the Hepburn bill, which the committee has heretofore on three or more occasions presented with unanimous concurrence. The committee has all the time stood firmly united upon the support of this great and wise policy of President McKinley, and the majority of the committee still adheres to it.

The minority abandon it in the statement of their views submitted to the Senate, and advise that Congress will direct the President to make an agreement with Colombia for canal concessions, and with the Panama Canal Company for the property it claims to own in connection with the Panama Canal and the Panama Railroad. This is done without pointing out the way by which such an agreement is possible to be made with Colombia under present conditions, or is even probable in the future. If Colombia is honest and respectful to the comity between nations in diplomatic intercourse, her draft of a convention is a sincere declaration of her attitude, otherwise it is only a discreditable finesse.

The adoption of the Spooner substitute is a repudiation of McKinley's great agreements with Costa Rica and Nicaragua, which will necessarily release those States from any obligation to comply with them and must create a bad state of feeling toward us in those Republics instead of the sincere and honorable regard they have always had for the United States.

They will deeply feel the rebuff and will not again be willing to have the United States approach them on this subject, as Mr. McKinley approached them with earnest and honorable importunity only to be snubbed by Congress when some glittering fraud is presented to tempt our cupidity and to provide $40,000,000 as the pay of its contrivers.

Unless we are ready to perform our duty to the people of the United States, sword in hand and in defiance of the world's scorn and its combined powers, we will not get an isthmian canal by an adroit bargain with a corporation that renounces the control of the State under whose laws it has its existence. We had better follow the advice of Ammen, Grant, Frelinghuysen, and Harrison, and the solemn agreements of McKinley, rather than lay aside an honorable and just course of dealing to follow the Panama Canal corruptionists, and the church party in Colombia by furnishing them money to oppress the liberal party there and to cut the throats of innocent people.

It is these people, in wicked combination, that the Spooner amendment compels us to deal with, in giving an offensive rebuff to Nicaragua and Costa Rica, and in utter abandonment of the agreements made with them by President McKinley.

The committee has been right in each of its unanimous reports in support of those agreements, and the majority are still right in adhering to them, while the minority are wrong in repudiating them.

The Senate has been fully informed as to the character of Panama as a region of pestilence, the Senator from the granite hills of New Hampshire to the contrary notwithstanding, the constant and unceasing nursery of death from climatic diseases, and that this condition is beyond remedy unless we can change the climate and prevent the tides that purge the oceans and make the bays of Panama and Colon the dumping ground of their excrement.

The evidence is full, complete, unquestionable, and as irrevocable as history on the subject of the pestilence that has its summer and winter home at Panama.

The Senate is also fully informed as to the character of the population in the region of the Panama Canal; that it is not homogeneous; that it contains every variety of the human family, except the best varieties; that it is the theater of insurrection, internecine warfare, mob rule, and pillage, and has been so for more than sixty years; that it is under the pall of the concordat of 1886, which divorces people at their option who have been married according to civil law in any country, if the ceremony was not performed by a Catholic priest, and punishes whoever may speak or write in condemnation of that church or its priesthood, and controls the schools and the text-books from which the children are taught, whether the books are secular or religious.

The Senate knows that the civil war that has raged for three years in Colombia was largely provoked by that infamous concordat and by the frauds of the Panama Canal Company, and that the Colombian Congress has not assembled since it dissolved in 1898, in consequence of its refusal to extend to that company a further lease of life for six years. You can no more gather a congress in Colombia, sir, to sit there voluntarily, than you can find a hundred men who are willing to go to the jail in this city and stay there for a year. They will not risk their lives to get to the capital. You can not have a congress there until the present revolution is ended.

The Government of Colombia is now a simple dictatorship; and that is what we are asked to go down there and make a treaty with. Well, we should have to hold it up after we made the treaty; we should have to spend more money to stiffen them to stand by the treaty than we would have to expend in buying out this fraudulent, corrupt Panama Canal project.

I hope the Senate realizes the danger of undertaking to construct and maintain a canal in that country or the indefinite delay of waiting until the animosities have died out which have been excited by such conditions and are so bitter and so bloody.

The Senate is bound to see that the alliance between the church-party government and the Panama Canal Company is formed for the purpose of furnishing money to that government to repress the insurrection of the Liberal party and to pay off and discharge the corruptionists who have wrecked the old canal company and now propose to expire and in its last will and testament to sell the body of the new company to the anatomists for the dissecting table.

But if this is not enough to forbid us from fostering this alliance for the benefit of the transcontinental railways, I believe that we will at least halt in this line of action when we examine into the heavy exactions made by the railroads upon our suffering people under positive agreements between these companies and the Panama Railroad Company for the express purpose of such exactions.

The proofs are all in the records of Congress. They are complete, and no one questions them. I will only delay the Senate while I make a few quotations from the contracts, sworn statements of witnesses, and committee reports, that establish these abuses.

I read:

APPENDIX A.

[House Report No. 2615, Fifty-second Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Rules, to whom were referred the resolutions heretofore introduced by Mr. Fellows and Mr. Geary, respectively, reported the same back with the recommendation that the resolution herewith submitted be adopted in lieu thereof, viz:

I will append this entire report to my remarks lest some Senator might have it to say that I had garbled the record. I have need to refer, though, only to parts of it. The part I now omit to read relates to the duties of the committee. The committee say in their report:

The Panama Railroad is a corporation under the laws of New York, and its directory and the rights of ownership of its shares are governed by the laws of that State.

Something our honorable friends on this floor omit to notice entirely, that after we get through with the Panama Company and Colombia we have to go to New York and get an act of the legislature to authorize the United States to become the full owner of the company.

Your committee being instructed to ascertain whether any sums of money were expended by the Panama Canal Company, or its promoters, for the purpose of preventing opposition in this country to the plans of said canal has done its utmost in the limited time before the end of the present Congress to investigate this matter.

It has been unable thus far to trace directly or indirectly the expenditure of any money whatever in a corrupt way to influence the legislative or executive action of the United States Government. It may be that no investigation, however prolonged, after this lapse of time could be efficient in making such discovery, even if such corrupt use of money was made; but this is the subject of which your committee does not desire authoritatively to express its opinion that further investigation would be entirely fruitless.

Certain facts in relation to the expenditure of money on the part of the canal company, however, are distinctively proven.

In the year 1879 the original subscription to the stock of the Panama Company was opened in France, of which country the canal company, by its technical name of the Universal Interoceanic Canal Company, is a corporation. The original subscription was an entire failure, and great weight must be given to the opinion that it was a failure principally on account of the distrust as to the attitude of the United States toward this canal project which was universally entertained in Europe.

It is a fact too well known to have required testimony to be offered that the entire tone of the executive branch of this Government during the Administration of President Hayes, and the entire current of our diplomatic correspondence was one of intense loyalty to the idea that not merely no foreign government, but no foreign corporation indirectly supported or controlled by any foreign government, should ever obtain any right to construct a canal across the Isthmus. In fact, during the two years preceding the close of the Hayes Administration the correspondence of our Government was kept within ordinary diplomatic courtesy of protest on this subject only by the belief, which results have proved to be well founded, that the canal constructed on the plans and ideas of De Lesseps and his associates was an idle dream, practically hopeless of accomplishment.

It seems clear that the promoters of the canal company saw that no success would attend their efforts to obtain subscriptions in Europe unless the public opinion of America on this subject should either be modified or that the people of Europe should be persuaded that the public opinion of the American people had been modified. De Lesseps visited this country in the winter of 1879-80, and a single instance will show how determined the promoters of the canal were, whatever was the popular opinion in this country, that Europe should be persuaded that it was not hostile to the canal. On the very day of De Lesseps's arrival in Washington President Hayes sent his message to Congress affirming in strong terms the position of his Administration as to the Monroe doctrine in its broadest acceptation.

That message as it appeared in the press was translated to De Lesseps, and his answer was characteristic and immediate. To the amazement of his American friends, who had translated him this message, he at once telegraphed to Paris that the President's message had guaranteed the neutrality of the Panama Canal. This seemed to be the beginning of a great change in the tone of the press of Paris and of France, and from the time of De Lesseps's visit to this country there seemed to be an assurance that America was not hostile, but, on the contrary, very friendly to the enterprise. It was after the return of De Lesseps to France that the decision was made that an American committee of men of prominence whose solid names would be a guaranty of the financial stability of the enterprise should be selected.

I have papers—which I will produce in the Senate if anyone wishes me to do so—showing that Mr. De Lesseps in a colloquy in Paris with the Colombian minister boldly asserted that he was ready to throw off his garments and take up arms for the purpose of fighting for Colombia against the United States, shortly after the time that he was here making these representations to our people.

The report continues:

The object of this is perfectly clear. It was to give a widespread public impression that American capital, in the persons of some of its most respectable agencies, with ramifications, correspondents, and connections in every financial center of all localities in the United States, was backing the enterprise, and that Americans intended to become shareholders in the canal. It was intended first by the gentlemen who were selected to compose this committee to choose General Grant to lend his name to this enterprise to give to this American committee not merely financial weight, but the patriotic glory of a great name at the head of it, so as to impress the American people with its international or binational character.

General Grant having declined, it was clear that the next best thing to do was to secure the name, as chairman of this committee, of some gentleman widely known, of political experience and position, and, if possible, one whose orthodoxy in the past in relation to the Monroe doctrine would make his support of the canal project all the stronger in the eyes of the American people. The American committee, by mutual agreement, under suggestions from the financial agents of the canal company in Paris, had already been composed of the great banking houses of J. & W. Seligman, Drexel, Morgan & Co., and Winslow, Lanier & Co., of New York.

Each of these houses was to designate one of its members to form the American committee, and the then Secretary of the Navy, Hon. R. W. Thompson, was decided upon as chairman, and in the autumn of 1880 the offer was made to him, through J. & W. Seligman, to leave the Cabinet and assume the title of the chairman of the American committee, with a salary to be paid at not less than 125,000 francs.

The house of Seligman & Co., of London, in which the New York banking firm of J. & W. Seligman were interested, had been the financial agents of the Navy Department during the Hayes Administration, and personal acquaintance between the Seligmans and Mr. Thompson had been the consequence.

Testimony has been taken showing that this action on the part of the Secretary of the Navy was a great disappointment and surprise to Mr. Hayes, and he so expressed himself to others than Mr. Thompson.

It is clear that the whole tone of the Administration had been suspicious of and hostile toward the enterprise into which Mr. Thompson was willing to go, and it is perfectly clear that had not Mr. Thompson been a member of that Administration, no controlling reason existed for his selection as chairman of a committee intrusted, or supposed to be intrusted, with such great financial and commercial responsibilities.

Mr. Thompson tendered his resignation early in December, 1880, and it was formally accepted by the President a few days thereafter.

The truth is, Mr. Thompson tendered his resignation because the President demanded it, and it was accepted in five minutes or five seconds after President Hayes was informed of his becoming the chief promoter and president of this American committee to carry out De Lesseps's plan. This may be rugged history, but I think there is a great deal of credit in it toward Mr. Hayes.

I think the honorable President of the Senate, perhaps, was on the committee which heard the statement of De Lesseps when he declared that he was for a sea-level canal, and that if a lock canal was to be thought of Nicaragua was the only location.

It is significant of the controlling reasons for the haste in which this matter of Mr. Thompson's resignation from the Cabinet was concluded by him, that we find him writing, on December 16, that arrangements should be made that his salary should begin on the 20th of December, in order that his friends might "be assured that his position was fixed beyond a peradventure," and that a promise to this effect "would satisfy his friends and put the Nicaraguans on their backs."

Who were "the Nicaraguans" to whom Mr. Thompson referred? They were the men who had hopes merely that some future day might inaugurate a Nicaraguan Canal—hopes inspired by the confidence they had in the judgment of General Grant and in the honest, sincere, yes, severe fidelity of men like Humphreys and Ammen, who made the surveys there during six years to determine which was the best route, and who had decided in favor of Nicaragua. That was all they had to do.

To "put the Nicaraguans on their backs" meant to nip the whole Nicaraguan idea in the bud and to prevent any American Congress from having the audacity to back up the opinions of these men that Nicaragua was a better route than Panama. Here in the galleries I have seen them day after day watching these proceedings, and they are here now looking upon us, the successors of the men who started this arrangement that caused poor Mr. Thompson to lose reputation—I am afraid to lose it all—for he had an honorable reputation.

The committee proceed:

It was at this time that the Forty-sixth Congress appointed a special committee to examine and report on interoceanic routes. At the same time the Committee on Foreign Affairs was charged with the examination and report upon the so-called "Crapo resolution," as to whether the Panama Canal project was a violation of the Monroe doctrine or was detrimental to American interests.

In the Senate the Burnside resolution to a similar effect was under consideration.

Your committee repeat that it has not found any evidence to show that any corrupt or improper means were used to stifle the investigation or the discussion of these resolutions. In fact, in spite of the arguments of Mr. Thompson and the counsel employed by him to assist, the Crapo resolution was reported back to the House in a somewhat modified form, but with a report ringing with true American patriotism, and a manly, yet conservative assertion of the Monroe doctrine as it is generally understood in the United States.

The select committee on interoceanic routes also made a report strongly supporting the idea that the United States should control all transit over the Isthmus, at least in so far as to prevent any European or non-American nation from having a preponderating influence. But it will be remembered that it was at the short session of the Fortieth Congress, with a change of administration coming on the 4th of March, that these reports were made, as the present one will be, just at the close of the session, and your committee can see reasonable ground for the belief that these resolutions and reports were not acted upon simply from the general apathy of the House and the stress of other business at the close of the session.

Your committee find that for the next three or four years Colonel Thompson was exceedingly vigilant in watching the legislation of Congress and most active and able in his efforts and influence to postpone the consideration of any legislation, either directly or indirectly, tending to work an injury to the cause of the Panama Canal Company. He appeared before committees, House and Senate, personally and by printed arguments and briefs.

These, he thinks, had great weight in the defeat of the Nicaragua Canal plans in whatever shape they came up, but it is not clear that, outside of this, he had anything directly to do with the shaping of public opinion in this country or bringing about what seems to have been an apparent acquiescence, or at least an indifference, on the part of the press and the people. So far as the testimony goes, the work of the American committee was altogether done by Mr. Thompson, and consisted of supervising purchases for a part of the time for the construction of the canal, and this persistent, watchful, and successful supervision of the legislation of the United States.

I hope that these visitors who are here in the galleries every day have not the right to represent Mr. Thompson's ghost while they sit here and carry on that same work. Sometimes I am a little doubtful about it. Some things go on in the Senate, of which I am informed, although I do not know, which look very queer.

The members of the American committee other than himself were supposed by Mr. Thompson to have received no compensation whatever except their commission as bankers and brokers in obtaining subscriptions and furthering the sale of the stocks and bonds of the canal company and in the handling and transmission of the very large amount of money spent in this country for the purchase of supplies of various kinds.

It was the object of the committee to see that to as great an extent as possible the purchase of supplies of raw material, of machinery and tools should be made in the United States as an aid to make it appear that America had no hostility but every reason to look with a friendly eye on this enterprise. The total amount of money for purchases of this kind passing through the single house of J. & W. Seligman and distributed to American trade was upward of $40,000,000, and that house is not able to say that no further accounts of money came through other banking houses to be spent in America for similar ends. This, however, was all spent by purchasing agents of the canal company, and their vouchers for their purchases were forwarded to Paris for approval.

There was one thing, however, which struck the only three salaried officers of the Panama Canal Company whose testimony we have been able to get as an entire surprise. This fact is that these three banking houses named above received, apparently for the loan of their names and for nothing else to this enterprise, the immense sum of 6,000,000 francs, or $1,200,000; $400,000 apiece, or $50,000 a year, was paid these houses without the knowledge of the chairman of that committee, who all the time supposed that he was the important factor in this enterprise, and was himself receiving only half of that sum annually.

In fact, two years before the canal company went into liquidation it is in evidence that Mr. Thompson voluntarily reduced his salary by one-half—that is, to $12,500—remaining in complete ignorance that the other members of the committee, of which he was still chairman, were still each receiving $50,000.

Mr. Thompson must have been overcredulous and too confiding to deal with men who were exploiting this organized fraud.

These banking houses state they had no specific duties to render in return for these subsidies; that they had no employment or interest to effect the sale of canal stock or bonds, and that, in fact, practically none were sold in the United States. What influence was exercised upon the financial public opinion of the United States by the names of these three great banking houses, what indirect credit and popularity was given to the enterprise through their numerous correspondents and connections throughout the country, is perhaps impossible now to estimate, but to effect this was the object of the formation of this American committee; a committee which testifies that it had no regular meetings, and some members of which were never present at a meeting or knew whether any minutes were ever kept by the committee, while each of these houses was receiving $400,000.

This fact, if it is a measure of the general conduct and management of the Panama Canal Company, may possibly explain why it was compelled to go into liquidation as soon as it did.

There is another thing which shows the French estimate of the character of the American people, which seems to be that any sum of money that you shake at the Americans will cause them to do whatever you want done, if it is large enough.

That has been exemplified here when the drop was made from a hundred and nine millions to forty million dollars at one fall; when some $5,000,000 is held out before this august Senate as a reason for changing the policy of this Government and discrediting all the vast number of men who have advocated and testified in favor of the Nicaragua route and entering into a questionable bargain with a corrupt company. I am not misquoting, misstating, or exaggerating anything about this. They believe we are capable of it, and when this substitute is passed they will think they know it in their own judgment, and the American people will believe it.

The only specific matter the three banking members of the American committee seem to have had in charge and to have accomplished was the purchase of the stock of the Panama Railroad Company by the canal company at a price more than double what it had been quoted in the market for two or three years previous to the beginning of these negotiations. This stock had been selling from $140 to $150, and the result of the negotiations and contract of sale was that the Panama Canal Company purchased 68,500 shares out of the 70,000 shares of stock, at a price of $291—$250 a share for the stock, $41 and some cents on each share for certain "assets" of the railroad company, the nature of which is not very clear.

As to the second part of the resolution referred to your committee, relating to the situation in the past few years and at present of American commerce upon the Isthmus, your committee feels that it has obtained all the evidence needed to establish certain facts beyond controversy.

This was an American corporation, the controlling interest of it purchased by the Panama Canal Company.

On the 1st of February, 1878, the Pacific Mail Company, a corporation organized under the laws of New York, owning and running steamers between New York and Aspinwall on the Atlantic, and between Panama and San Francisco on the Pacific, together with certain intermediate Central American and Mexican ports, made a contract for fifteen years with the Panama Railroad Company, also a corporation under the laws of New York. At that time there was no showing that there were any foreign stockholders in either of these two corporations.

This contract provided that the Pacific Mail should have the exclusive right "to bill freight through" from New York to San Francisco, and vice versa, over the Panama Railroad, and all freight offered by others between these points could not be "billed through," but would have to pay local rates on the isthmus railway. The sum paid for this was to be a lump sum of $75,000 a month to the railroad company, which, by modification, was afterwards lowered to $55,000 a month.

Corresponding every time.

A remarkable fact about this contract is that it was the result of a contract made before that time between the Pacific Mail Company and the Transcontinental Railway Pool, as at that date the Association of Transcontinental Railways was called.

As I have read—

That was a contract whereby the Transcontinental Railway Pool, embracing all of the roads between the Missouri River and the Pacific seaports and covering entirely all railway traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, several of which had received large donations of public lands and the bonds of which the United States Government was guaranteeing, paid the Pacific Mail the sum of $90,000 a month, which was afterwards reduced to $75,000 a month, for the consideration that the Pacific Mail would carry only 1,200 tons a month of freight each way between New York and San Francisco, and on that freight would allow the transcontinental pool to fix the price and rate to be paid.

That was the upshot of the contract, although the form was a reservation of space for 1,200 tons a month for the exclusive benefit of the Transcontinental Railway roads—whether the steamers sailed full or half empty.

After the passage of the interstate commerce law had compelled the dissolution of the so-called "pool," a transcontinental railway association was formed, which, under some name or other, is still in existence; and down to the present time the Pacific Mail, subsidized by the Government in a large amount each year, has been allowing the transcontinental railways to fix the rates and limit the traffic over its line.

These two contracts were so far practically parts of one and the same that the amount paid the Panama Railroad monthly was fixed with regard to that paid to the Pacific Mail by the transcontinental roads, and when the latter was lowered from $90,000 a month to $75,000 the former was lowered from $75,000 to $55,000. The object of this is frankly stated by the officers of both the transcontinental roads and the Pacific Mail; it was to maintain rates above the level to which they would fall if free competition between these several routes had continued.

When we pass the Spooner amendment in favor of the Panama route we will cut off every sailing ship in the United States from all possible access in competition with the steamers, and that same arrangement will be instituted again by the Senate, not under a contract such as that Pacific Mail contract, but by legislation.

It seems to be certain that a very large, if not an absolutely controlling, interest in the stock and directory of the Pacific Mail Company is owned by individuals and estates very largely interested in the stock and directory of the transcontinental roads; and it is proven that the same individuals composing a majority of the directory of the Pacific Mail composed a majority of the directors present at the meeting of the Panama Railroad Company's directory at which the contract between the Pacific Mail and the railroad company of February 1, 1878, was ratified and executed.

That this system has for fifteen years been diminishing commerce between New York and San Francisco across the Isthmus is not denied. It is stated, as a justification that the Transcontinental Railway Association, controlling, as it did, under these contracts, the prices and traffic of the Pacific Mail, used the latter as an active factor to defeat—

There we come to it—"used the latter as an active factor to defeat"— the competition of sailing-vessel traffic around Cape Horn, and thus were able to maintain the rates of the railroad companies as against that of sailing-vessel competition.

If a contract of this kind was necessary at that time to prevent competition of sailing vessels around Cape Horn, what will be the case when we have dug a canal and consecrated it to steamers, a canal that is an absolute prohibition upon sailing ships? What will be the consequence?

The motive is the same, but the inducement is very much greater with the transcontinental railroads and the great steamship companies that wish also to get rid of this sailing competition through the Panama Canal. Sir, I would not under any conditions disable a great American industry like that for the accommodation of any friend or any man who ever lives in this world. We can not honorably do it.

It is obvious that this did not tend to increase American shipping or tend to the encouragement of the merchant marine of the commerce of the United States.

It seems to your committee that this state of things can not be beneficial to the general interstate trade or commerce of the United States, nor can it see that it is of any particular benefit to our trade with foreign countries. It is stated that this arrangement between the Pacific Mail and the Transcontinental Railway Association came to an end in December last, which is just about the time that negotiations between the Panama Railroad Company and the Pacific Mail as to a renewal of the former contract seems to have fallen through.

And it is likewise in evidence that the final check to the attempts at making a new contract between the Panama Railroad Company and the Pacific Mail was given by the following letter to the vice-president of the railroad company from the controlling member of the executive committee of the Pacific Mail, who is also universally recognized as one of the controlling influences of the transcontinental railways:

C. P. HUNTINGTON, 23 BROAD STREET,
New York, December 28, 1892.

CHARLES COUDERT, Esq.,
68-70 William street, N. Y.

MY DEAR SIR: Herewith I return memorandum that you gave me on Monday. Of course this would not do, but it does seem to me as though there could be such a contract made as would be largely beneficial to both interests.

Yours, truly, C. P. HUNTINGTON.

Whatever be the case in the last sixty days, it is perfectly clear to your committee that the Panama Railroad Company has for fifteen years been prevented by these arrangements from being a competitor with the transcontinental railway lines.

Your committee recommends that whenever, under provisions of the act of March 3, 1891, "for ocean mail service and to promote commerce," the Postmaster-General shall enter into contract with any line of vessels, a clause shall be inserted in said contract to the effect that if said steamship line shall enter into any combination or arrangement with competing lines of traffic the result of which is to diminish traffic or raise or maintain rates of freight on American commerce, foreign or domestic, over what free competition would effect, that said contract may be terminated forthwith by the Postmaster-General.

Your committee regrets, so far as the ownership of nearly all the stock goes, that the control of any American corporation, as the Panama Railroad is, should be held in foreign hands, particularly in the hands of the liquidator or receiver of another corporation, also foreign-appointed by foreign judicial authority and subject to foreign judicial supervision. It fails to see, however, that any law, treaty stipulation, or contract obligation has been violated by the purchase of these railroad shares by the Panama Canal Company, or that as yet any discrimination has been attempted against American commerce or any injustice practiced thereon on account of such foreign ownership of this stock.

If that committee of the House had had the benefit of the testimony that came before the Committee of the Senate on Interoceanic Canals, they would have come to a different conclusion, because the Committee on Interoceanic Canals have presented proof of a number of contracts. The testimony shows them. The testimony of the secretary of the Panama Railroad Company sets out the terms of the contract intended to monopolize the carrying trade of all countries, as far as possible, carried across the isthmian railway in competition with the interest of the commerce of the United States. Thus are we bitten by the adder that we have brought to our fireside in the winter time in a log that was frozen.

On another occasion, having no reference to canals, but to transcontinental railroads, Mr. Huntington was a witness on a committee that I had the honor to be a member of. He was under oath and I asked him the following question:

Your guaranty appears to be that the gross earnings upon through freight and passengers between New York and San Francisco to be provided to this steamship company by the railroad companies shall be $75,000 per month. These railroad companies constituted the Transcontinental Association?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.

Senator MORGAN (reading from the contract):

"All the gross earnings of said steamers from through business between New York and San Francisco each way shall go to and belong and be payable to said party of the first part or credited upon its said guaranty to said steamship company. In consideration of said guaranty of said party of the first part the said Pacific Mail Steamship Company promises and agrees that it will, at its own cost and expense, dispatch and run from the port of New York for Aspinwall not more than three nor less than two through steamers per month, and not more than three nor less than two steamers connecting therewith from Panama to San Francisco, and from the port of San Francisco or Panama not more than three nor less than two through steamers per month, and not more than three nor less than two steamers connecting therewith from Aspinwall to New York, and that said steamship company will permit said party of the first part to fix the rates at which all their freight between New York and San Francisco and of passengers shall be transported by the vessels of the steamship company from the port of New York to San Francisco, and from the port of San Francisco to the port of New York, and will furnish room on each of said steamers from New York and San Francisco, respectively, and their connecting steamers for the transportation of and will transport from New York to San Francisco and from San Francisco to New York all and only such passengers and such freight as may be obtained under rates fixed by said party of the first part to an amount as to freight not exceeding 600 tons of 2,000 pounds each in case it runs two steamers per month, and 400 tons in case it runs three steamers per month upon any one steamer, the intent being * * * that the steamship company shall carry monthly an average of 600 tons per vessel in case two steamers per month are run or a monthly average of 400 tons per vessel in case three steamers per month are run.

"The understanding and intention of this agreement is that the party of the first part shall, through agents appointed by itself, have entire and exclusive control of all the other business of the said steamship company between New York and San Francisco each way, and that no through freight or passengers shall be taken except at prices to be fixed by the party of the first part and by its consent, it being understood that said control shall be exercised through the established agencies of said steamship company."

Now, Mr. Huntington, without going through this paper, it appears to be a contract under which the party of the first part, representing several railroad companies, has a right to fix the freight upon a certain amount of tonnage on each of those vessels?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; that is it.

Senator MORGAN. Which was the largest amount—occupying nearly the entire carrying capacity of the ship. The object of that was to be enabled, in competition with those steamships, to keep up the rate of charges on your railroads and on the railroads represented in this agreement without cutting.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; the object was to make us able to get paying rates.

Senator MORGAN. And this arrangement between the railroad companies represented by Mr. Smith and the steamship company represented by Mr. Gould put it in the power of Mr. Smith and of the roads he represented to fix the rate of freights both on the steamship line and on the overland lines to any figure they saw proper?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Any price that was fair and right.

Senator MORGAN. He was not controlled in any way by that consideration.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. We could not raise the rates upon grain tonnage, which is a low-priced tonnage, and which goes around Cape Horn.

Senator MORGAN. It goes that way now?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes; tonnage where the cost per pound is small.

Senator MORGAN. Was not the effect of this arrangement to put all the freight south of San Francisco, going and coming, under the control of these particular railroads?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. It extended over the whole coast. The Northern Pacific reached Seattle, the Union Pacific reached Portland, the Oregon and California reached Tehama Bay, and the Atchison and Topeka ran to San Diego.

Senator MORGAN. How did it happen that this combination of railroads and steamship lines found it expedient to abandon their contract?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I suppose it was on account of the cutting of rates. That is why these agreements have always gone up.

Senator MORGAN. Cutting of rates by whom?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. By some of the railroad lines.

Senator MORGAN. Not by some of those included in the agreement?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think so. If they had all agreed upon a fair rate, and had all held to it, it was a very fair and proper thing to have done. I did not have much to do with the making of that agreement.

Senator MORGAN. The companies that came into the agreement—some of them—broke away from it?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I assume that, because notice was given to withdraw from the agreement.

Senator MORGAN. The withdrawal was not caused by competition from the Canadian railroads or from the Northern Pacific?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No; the Northern Pacific was in the agreement, and I think the Canadian Pacific was in it.

Senator MORGAN. Then it was not competition from that quarter?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. It may have been. There was a screw loose somewhere.

Senator MORGAN. It was not the competition from the companies that were outside of the agreement, but from those that were inside, that caused you to have to break it up?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I should say so.

Senator MORGAN. Did the Panama Railroad have anything to do with causing you to throw up this agreement?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think not.

Senator MORGAN. Did not that railroad company raise the rates for transportation across the Isthmus?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The Isthmus rates we had nothing to do with.

Senator MORGAN. Did not the Panama Company notify you, or notify Mr. Smith, that it would no longer be bound by that agreement?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think not.

Senator MORGAN. And that they would levy their usual charges?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think not.

Senator MORGAN. And was not the result of it that you had a lawsuit in New York about it?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No; we never had a lawsuit about it.
Senator MORGAN. Was not a suit in contemplation?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. That was on an old contract of 1872; not for San Francisco business at all, but on the west coast of the coast of Mexico and with the small republics south of it.
Senator MORGAN. That was a different contract?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. Yes.
Senator MORGAN. How long did that 1872 contract run?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think it ran some twenty years.
Senator MORGAN. Who had that contract?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. It was between the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, by Col. W. Park, I think, on the one side, and the Panama Railroad Company on the other. I do not know who its president was.
Senator MORGAN. Was the Central Pacific interested in that contract which ran for nearly twenty years?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. No; none of the Pacific roads had anything to do with it?
Senator MORGAN. That was a contract for the purpose of keeping down competition?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. Not between San Francisco and New York. As I remember, they gave a certain price over the isthmus—a certain price per month.
Senator MORGAN. So that neither the Central Pacific or the Southern Pacific had any connection with that agreement?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. Not at all. It was before the Southern Pacific was commenced. It was in 1872.
Senator MORGAN. Did you make your money back which you paid to this steamship company—$75,000 a month?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. I suppose so.
Senator MORGAN. You heard no complaint about not making it back?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. I never heard any. It seemed a proper thing to do to get fair rates.
Senator MORGAN. How much money, in the aggregate, was paid to this steamship company presided over by Mr. George J. Gould during the continuance of this contract?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. Seventy-five thousand dollars a month, and it ran about three years. That would make $2,700,000.
Senator MORGAN. You collected that, of course, out of the people of California?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. If we did the business we collected our freight upon it. We always do so before we deliver the goods.
Senator MORGAN. So that the loss of that sum fell upon them?
Mr. HUNTINGTON. I do not understand that there would be a loss in paying honest freights on goods.

A cutting of rates by whom? He answered by some of the railroad lines, and then he proceeded to state that he thought this was a perfectly right and fair transaction so far as the people of the United States were concerned, because after all they were not made to pay more freight than they ought to have paid any way.

The most humiliating and repulsive feature of this entire situation, to the people of the United States, is the direct, constant, and offensive intrusion of the Panama Canal Company into the legislation of Congress, the hearings of committees, the deliberations of canal commissions, and the frequent presentation of letters of advice, and remonstrance to the Secretary of State, and to the President, rebuking the conduct of the House of Representatives, and its ignorance.

The accusation of the ignorance of the House of Representatives has been so harped upon by the agents of the Panama Canal Company that it has grown into a bad habit, into which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] has fallen, inadvertently, of course.

Two leading characters have had charge of this campaign of false pretenses and misrepresentations—M. Hutin and Mr. Cromwell, who is general counsel for this company, and has a large experience in the hospital treatment of infirm corporations.

M. Hutin is aggressive and quick to seize upon and misunderstand the attitude of his diplomatic antagonist, and becomes testy when he is foiled and resorts to misrepresentation to drive his adversary into a corner. When he is defeated he breaks away from the contest and takes a dignified and defiant attitude, as he did when Admiral Walker refused to be placed in the attitude of making an offer to purchase the Panama Canal. He had made no such offer, and so informed M. Hutin in unmistakable terms.

Thereupon, M. Hutin appealed to the President in a long and formidable address, taking care to omit from his statement of facts the most important letter that Admiral Walker had written.

Thereupon, M. Hutin, more in anger than in sorrow, left the country and went to Paris. He was in bad shape to face the storm that came upon him when the House passed the second Hepburn bill, now before the Senate. When it broke upon him he stood by the $109,000,000 which was the value of the canal and railroad property as it had been appraised, and refusing to join the set that intended to capture the $40,000,000 for their own purposes, they turned him out of office and determined to become voluntary bankrupts, but to reserve the $40,000,000 from their schedule of their assets.

M. Hutin disappeared when his scheme failed, but Mr. Cromwell followed the sinking ship and kept a sharp lookout for the salvage.

As soon as the Panama Canal Company found they could not induce Frenchmen to put up the money to complete the canal that had caused France so much trouble and mortification of spirit, to say nothing of the vast sums that the Panama Canal Company had filched from the French people of the middle classes, they turned to the United States a second time and put their case in the hands of a lawyer.

De Lesseps, when he made a like resort to the United States, in a like emergency, opened the money chest of the old company and paid more than $4,000,000 into the hands of the American committee and dismantled a Presidential Cabinet.

He worked high diplomacy, sustained by a plethora of money, and failed to get our Government snared in his trap.

The new company could not hope to succeed in open efforts to purchase leading characters after De Lesseps had failed so disastrously.

In the meantime Congress was moving toward the point we had finally reached, of the exclusive ownership and control of a canal by the United States, to be paid for by appropriations from the Treasury, and the only hope left to the New Panama Canal Company was to sell out to the Government.

To accomplish this feat was the loved task of Mr. Cromwell. This new movement, which was made indispensable by the flat refusal of the French people to be a second time victimized, required adroit manipulation, and no one was so adroit as Mr. Cromwell.

He also had a keen appreciation of the innocent humor of the little Sunday-school girl, who, being asked to recite a Bible story, said: "The Bible does not tell stories. It tells the truth. It says that a lie is an abomination unto the Lord and an ever-present help in time of need." [Laughter.]

Mr. Cromwell opened his campaign of deception as to facts and concealment as to motives by giving to the President information of the excellent condition and bright prospects of the New Panama Canal Company.

To do this, in an official way, he sent a letter to the President, dated Paris, November 18, 1898, signed by "J. Bonnardel, the president of the board of directors," and certified by the secretary of the company, Ed. Lampre, that distinguished counsel who came over here to give us his testimony as to what French law means, and he was examined before the committee.

No description of this letter would do justice to its apparent innocence, which is only the veneer of its crafty diplomacy. I will ask leave to insert it in the RECORD. It is a most remarkable piece of adroit diplomacy. There is nothing like it that I have ever seen in any lawyer's brief before.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is from Lampre?

Mr. MORGAN. Certified by Ed. Lampre.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WELLINGTON in the chair). The Chair hears no objection, and the letter will be inserted in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

[Translation.]

[Compagnie Nouvelle du Canal de Panama, 7 Rue Louis le Grand, Paris. Capital, 65,000,000 francs.]

PARIS, November 18, 1898.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: The New Panama Canal Company believes it to be its duty to respectfully submit the following statement:

It is common knowledge that in 1889 the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interoceanique de Panama, the old company, fell into financial difficulties after about one-third of the canal had been finished. The rights of that company then passed judicial administration. A liquidator (receiver) was appointed by the judgment of the civil tribunal of the Seine under date of the 4th of February, 1889. During his administration (1889–1894) and with the authorization of the court, the greatest care was taken to preserve and maintain the work already done, and a prolongation was obtained from the Republic of Colombia of the time stipulated for the completion of the canal, thus preserving the rights of the company under its concession in their entirety.

In view of the advanced state of the work on the canal, and the considerable sum (at least $150,000,000) actually expended for canal work properly so called, and for installations and plant, the logical conclusion followed that the very large capital invested would be protected through a reorganization of the affairs which took place successfully in the month of October, 1894. At that time and with this object in view the undersigned company was organized under the general laws of France.

The company is a commercial association, formed exclusively upon private capital, and has no connection, alliance, or relation whatever with any government, except the relations established by the concessions which it holds from the Republic of Colombia. The board of directors of the company is an entirely new board and composed of gentlemen of independent positions, having no official relation with the old Panama Company, and for the most part identified with large financial and commercial enterprises.

Pursuant to judicial sale, authorized by the court as aforesaid, the undersigned company in 1894 became the sole owner of all the canal works, plant, material, concessions, and other property of the old company. The title of the undersigned to this property is therefore unquestionable, and has been officially recognized by the Government of Colombia.

Surveys had been made by the old company, but the new company, while making use of them, would not be bound by their conclusions. The board of directors resolved at the start to examine and study anew all the questions involved, making use of the most recent improvements in material and of the advances made in engineering.

It is needless for us to enumerate the difficulties and enormous expense involved in the choice of a definite plan for the execution of this work, which is one of the greatest undertakings of our time.

Different plans, equally practicable but varying in probable cost, have been studied. Many months have been spent in preparing, studying, and revising them. This work has not been done hastily and superficially. Engineers, chosen specially for their professional ability, have studied the question in all its details—technical, climatic, physical, geologic, and economic.

Though the skill of its own technical staff is worthy of the highest confidence, the undersigned company, out of abundant caution and in order to place beyond criticism the final conclusions, caused to be appointed an International Technical Commission, composed of engineers selected from different nationalities, a course which assures to the company the benefit of the widest possible experience, the severest judgment, and the most independent conclusions. The International Technical Commission is composed as follows:

M. Robaglia, president, inspector-general of roads and bridges (retired).
M. Bouvier, chairman, inspector-general of roads and bridges (retired).
General Abbot, United States Engineer Corps.
M. Castel, inspector-general of mines (retired).
M. Daymard, chief engineer of La Compagnie Transatlantique.
M. Fargue, inspector-general of roads and bridges (retired).
M. Fteley, chief engineer of the Croton Aqueduct, New York City.
M. Fulscher, private counselor to the minister of public works of Prussia, formerly technical director of the work of the Kiel Canal.
M. Hersent, civil engineer.
M. Hunter, chief engineer of the Manchester Canal.
M. Koch, councilor of public works of Germany; director of Technical Academy of Darmstadt; formerly member of the Imperial commission of the Kiel Canal.
M. Jules Martin, inspector-general of roads and bridges (retired).
M. Skalskowski, formerly director of the department of mines to the minister of agriculture and lands of Russia.
M. Sosa, chief engineer, Colombia.

As to all statistical and economic questions the new company established a special commission, presided over by M. Paul Leroy-Beaulieu, the eminent economist and a member of the Institute of France.

It is certain that the members of these two commissions are the most distinguished and able men in their professions. No one of them would compromise his reputation and his honor, acquired by a long life of eminent services, by formulating conclusions upon unfounded, incomplete, superficial, or uncertain information.

By the closest study of the subject; by actual inspection of the works of the canal, made by several of its members; by full discussion and by frequent exchange of views; by subjecting every problem to the critical judgment of all, thus obtaining the most varied opinions; by all the methods and with all the care which the most advanced technical experience could suggest, this eminent commission of engineers has reached a unanimous conclusion, which has been officially communicated to this company, and upon which this company is pursuing the work of construction. These conclusions, signed by every member of the commission, establish the entire feasibility and practicability of completing the canal.

We do not doubt that you will be interested to learn the essential features of our plans, which have been prepared with so much labor and care, and confirmed by four years of continuous study.

1. The old company had already substituted for the proposed sea-level canal a system of locks. This principle, with important modifications and improvements, has been adopted by the new company.
2. The length of the canal from ocean to ocean is 45 miles.
3. The locks will not exceed four on each slope of the divide; all locks will have a rock foundation, and all will have double lock chambers.
4. There is nothing in the physical conditions on the Isthmus to prevent a change from a canal with a system of locks to a sea-level canal should the latter seem desirable in the future.
5. The time of passage from ocean to ocean will be less than a day.
6. The harbors situated at either extremity (Panama and Colon) are not artificial harbors; they are natural harbors, safe and satisfactory, needing but slight improvement. This fact is known to all the world, thanks to commerce, which for almost fifty years has made use of the Panama route (the Panama Railroad).
7. Two-fifths of the work on the canal has been actually constructed; the remaining three-fifths is in a fair way of completion. During the last four years three or four thousand workmen, on an average, have been employed in working on the canal.
8. The company's concessions are unquestionable. The Republic of Colombia has given to the enterprise its cordial and sincere cooperation.
9. The existence and operation of the railroad, long established on the proposed line of the canal, greatly facilitates its construction.
10. No construction is planned which is not fully justified by practical experience.

Formerly the greatest difficulties were:

(a) The control of the floods of the Chagres River; and (b) The excavation of the Culebra Cut.

The manner in which each of these difficulties is to be surmounted is shown with the greatest detail in the report of the technical commission, which we have the honor to present to you.

The condition of the new company is equally satisfactory. Its assets, including the work actually done on the canal, the buildings, the machinery, the material on hand, exceeds in value 500,000,000 francs, or $100,000,000, which valuation has been made by a special commission, of which the former director of the National Academy of Roads and Bridges of France was chairman. The company has no mortgage or bonded indebtedness. The property is free from all incumbrance. The company has no other debts than monthly pay rolls. Its cash reserve is largely in excess of its actual needs.

The undersigned company also invites your attention to the provisions of its concession, particularly articles 5 and 6, which reserves all rights to the Government of the United States secured by the treaty with the Republic of Colombia signed in 1846 and ratified in 1848.

We have the honor to be, your obedient servants,

J. BONNARDEL,
The President of the Board of Directors.

Certified by the secretary of the company.

ED. LAMPRE.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Cromwell saw Mr. Hay and notified him of the coming of this missive. The ship was slow on its voyage, and Mr. Cromwell wrote Mr. Hay on November 28, 1898, as follows:

Mr. Cromwell to Mr. Hay.

NEW YORK, November 28, 1898.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the interview which you accorded me on Friday last and to your gracious assurance that you would give audience to the director-general of the New Panama Canal Company and ourselves in connection with the presentation to the President of the communication which the New Panama Canal Company is about to make to the Government, I beg leave to advise you that by reason of the severe prevailing storm La Touraine was delayed in arrival until to-day, and that we shall therefore not be able to translate the documents and prepare them for presentation before Wednesday.

I will advise you further of our coming, keeping in mind the preference which you indicated, that the hour of conference be about 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

I have the honor, etc.,

WM. NELSON CROMWELL,
American Counsel for New Panama Canal Company.

That was the introductory signal. This note magnifies the missive into the importance of a great state paper and its presentation into the dignity of a solemn State function. What was the alleged purpose of all this parade? Only to give information of the splendid condition and happy prospects of the New Panama Canal Company?

Your lordship sees me as I profess to be, in happy state and prepared, it would seem, to defy future adversities. But, knowing your sweet benevolence, I am here to honor your virtues by an early appeal to them if it should otherwise be, and to bespeak your hospitality. Not to house a mendicant, for I have no rags of beggary about me, but to welcome a gentleman of honor, should misfortune touch me with its envious bolt.

Mr. Cromwell seems to have been sitting for his picture when the playwright was thus describing a beggar's petition, disguised as a boastful assertion that he had no need of help.

Why should he then declare that this company was independent of France and had no relations to or connection with that Government? It was because the lawyer saw the danger in that point and wished to prevent the question from being made, as to the relations of France with this company.

Why did he venture on the gratuitous falsehood that this company became "the sole owner of all the canal works, plant, material, concessions, and other property of the old company," and that "the title of the undersigned is therefore unquestionable and has been recognized by the Government of Colombia?" Both of these statements were false. But what interest could the united statements serve if it was not the purpose of Cromwell when the letter was written to dispose of the canal property to the United States?

Cromwell knew that otherwise Mr. Hay could have no interest in this spectacular advertisement of the canal.

Why should he add the false statement that "the condition of the new company is equally satisfactory; that the company has no mortgage or bonded indebtedness; the property is free from all incumbrances; the company has no other debts than monthly pay rolls; its cash reserve is largely in excess of its actual needs."

These statements are apparently so gratuitous and so foreign to any interest of the United States in the subject that the presentation of them would be a ridiculous parade of boastful nonsense if there was no other design except to give information to the United States.

The covert meaning of this approach to the President is found in the last paragraph of his diplomatic epistle, as follows:

The undersigned company also invites your attention to the provisions of its concession, particularly Articles V and VI, which reserves all rights to the Government of the United States secured by treaty with the Republic of Colombia signed in 1846 and ratified in 1898.

A most remarkable declaration was that. What does it mean that he would essay to inform the President of the United States that the rights of the United States under the treaty with Colombia were reserved by contract? Why should he do it?

I will read the next letter of Mr. Cromwell to Mr. Hay, which shows an outbreak of Congress against the President of Colombia on account of this canal, which resulted in the adoption of a resolution by the House of Representatives, the office of President vacant.

This letter darkly hints at the real purpose of Cromwell's allusion to Articles V and VI of our treaty with Colombia. He sends another preliminary telegram to notify Mr. Hay of what is coming, a premonition of its great importance.

Mr. Cromwell to Mr. Hay.

[Telegram.]

NEW YORK, December 5, 1898.

Am writing you to-day concerning the cable from Consul-General Hart published Saturday. It is evident that the limited purpose and nature of the measure referred to is not fully reported from Bogota, and is given undue significance.

WM. NELSON CROMWELL,
Counsel New Panama Canal Company.

He always signs his name in full.

Mr. Cromwell to Mr. Hay.

MY DEAR SIR; I beg leave to confirm the telegram which I sent you at 10.45 this morning, as per inclosure.

Upon my return I learned through Director-General Hutin (who had preceded me to New York) that the measure which had just been acted on by one branch only of the Colombian Congress was a bill to authorize the executive to negotiate the terms of and to conclude a further prorogation of six years from 1904 for the completion of the canal under a communication which the company had addressed to the Government. in the form of which I inclose you a translation.

You will note that the company specifically stated to the Government that the prorogation was not a matter of absolute necessity, but was desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation to enable an even deeper cut to be made (and which would reduce the number of locks to four), but which reduction would of course require more time than the plan adopted.

You will note that the bill proposed to confer power upon the Executive, and this happened to arise under extraordinary political conditions in Bogotá. As you have probably been advised through official channels, a serious difference has recently been existing between the House of Representatives of Colombia and the President, the House having passed formal resolution declaring the office of President vacant, and refusing to recognize the qualification of the President before the supreme court.

We therefore construe the action of the House of Representatives as only a part of the strife between the House and the President, and not a declaration of the policy of the nation or the Congress in respect of the Panama Canal, and as not evidencing hostility to the company itself. We are the more confirmed in this belief because of the uniform consideration and cordiality displayed by the Congress and the Government to the New Panama Canal Company, which we have no doubt their minister at Washington would fully confirm to you.

Our company has not the least apprehension regarding any prorogation of its concessions it may consider necessary in the future.

I have, etc., your obedient servant,

WM. NELSON CROMWELL,
Counsel New Panama Canal Company.

If Senators, when they come to read this, will refer to the last clause of the letter which I have quoted, they will see what this man was driving at.

The treaty of 1846–1848 bound the United States to protect Colombia in the ownership and sovereignty over Colombia. It also bound us to protect the transit across the Isthmus.

The Canal Company fancied that it saw in this revolt, which is still flagrant, the opportunity to turn over the canal to the United States, so that, in protecting the canal, it would be protecting its own property.

It was a bold movement of the reckless lawyer to involve the United States in a war, if need be, to get rid of this property by selling it, or an interest in it, to the United States. This ugly device was received in silence by Mr. McKinley, and Mr. Cromwell was thrown upon his ingenuity to arrange another coup.

On the 21st of December, 1898, Mr. Cromwell informed Mr. Hay that the Government of Colombia (which means the President) had signed the extension of the concession until 1960.

This, of course, united the interests of Colombia and the Panama Canal Company in supporting the war of the President, at the head of the church party, against the Liberals, for which the canal company paid him $1,000,000 French gold to carry on the war. It was an extraordinary transaction. They had to put up with it when they paid him a million dollars in gold, and they paid it to get the President to sign this last concession, which is the basis of their title to-day, a part of it, after Congress had refused to ratify it and declared the presidency vacant because the President had signed the concession for a million dollars. That is the crowd that we are asked to shake hands with by treaty.

After that transaction Colombia was plunged into civil war. They are still fighting, and if we purchase the property of the canal company we must take the war along with the property, or if we do not buy ourselves into the conflict of arms the Liberal party will never forgive us for paying $1,000,000 to the church party to furnish them the sinews of war.

But to follow Mr. Cromwell. When he found that he could not inveigle the United States into the dishonorable scheme of capturing the canal and railroad, because we had engaged to protect them, and that to own them would be the easiest way to protect them, the canal company then broke up the peace and unity of the Colombian Government, as I have shown from admissions in his own letter, by buying the consent of the President to sign an extension of the concession that Congress had refused to ratify. There is where that Government went to pieces; that is the rock on which it broke, and it stays there yet.

The French people were still unwilling, notwithstanding this extension, to put any more money into the canal, and he again approached the President of the United States with a proposition for the joint ownership of stock in the New York or New Jersey corporation, under the title of the New Panama Canal Company of America.

To accomplish this project it was becoming, in his opinion, to boast more loudly than ever of the wealth and power of his company, and also to make a side lick at its rival, the Maritime Canal Company. That letter carries its own interpretation, and it will be seen, as it is read, that it is the last bid of a desperate gambler in corporation stocks.

On the 28th of February, 1899, Mr. Cromwell addressed the following letter to the President:

Messrs. Sullivan & Cromwell to Mr. Hay.

NEW YORK, February 28, 1899.

DEAR SIR: We beg leave to hand you herewith a copy of the communication which this day has been addressed to the President.

We are, etc.,

SULLIVAN & CROMWELL,
General Counsel.

Mr. Hutin and Messrs. Sullivan & Cromwell to the President.

NEW YORK, February 28, 1899.

SIR: 1. The New Panama Canal Company has never proposed and does not seek any appropriation or financial aid from the Government of the United States in the completion of its canal.

What a heroic outburst of independence that is!

2. It places its canal works on the Isthmus of Panama subject to the examination of this Government, or any special commission through whom it may be desired to make such examination, and will facilitate in every possible way any such desire of the Government.

3. The Government will find that fully two-fifths of the canal works are already constructed; that continuously during the past four years from 3,000 to 4,000 men, under a large force of engineers, have been and are now actually engaged upon its works; that all technical and physical problems have been solved by the eminent "International Engineering Commission," whose report of November 18 last is before you; that the canal is undoubtedly feasible and the harbors at both ends natural harbors and entirely satisfactory.

They say nothing about the eight millions it will take to fix the harbor at Colon.

That its concessions are perfect and unquestioned, and that the relations of the United States to the canal are especial and superior by reason of the "special and remarkable advantages" secured to it by the treaty of 1846 between the United States and Colombia, and which rights, whatever they may be, were scrupulously respected, observed, and confirmed in the concessions of Colombia to the Panama Canal Company, under which the canal is being completed.

4. While the New Panama Canal Company does not seek any financial aid from the Government, it recognizes the national sentiment in favor of acquiring some pecuniary interest in any canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Therefore, the New Panama Canal Company declares that if, as the result of any such investigation, the Government of the United States adopts the Panama route, the company, if the Government so desires, will reincorporate under the laws of the State of New York (under the laws of which State the Panama Railroad Company has existed for nearly fifty years), or of some other State of the Union—subject to the provisions of its concession, and vest its concessions and property in such corporation. It will also in said event accord to the United States such representation in its board of directors, and such opportunity to acquire an interest in its securities, as may be permitted by its concessions, which, of course, must be scrupulously observed.

It turned out to be the fate of New Jersey to receive that compliment—

And further, if the United States should desire to perpetuate or enlarge its existing rights and privileges, acquired under said treaty of 1846—

That means if they should undertake to take the Panama route in order to protect it—the company will conform to such supplemental treaty as may be entered into between the United States and Colombia.

We beg leave to say that yesterday, at a public hearing accorded us by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, we submitted to the chairman and gentlemen of that committee a communication to the foregoing purport, and have the honor to be,

Your obedient servants,

MAURICE HUTIN,
Director-General of the New Panama Canal Company.
SULLIVAN & CROMWELL,
General Counsel, New York City.

And on March 11, 1899, M. Hutin sent the following letter to the President:

Mr. Hutin to the President.

COMPAGNIE NOUVELLE DU CANAL DE PANAMA,
45 Wall Street, New York City, March 11, 1899.

To the PRESIDENT:

Referring to the act of Congress approved on the 4th instant, respecting an investigation of the Panama and Nicaragua canals, the New Panama Canal Company, as one of the subjects of the inquiry, respectfully invites attention to its communication addressed to you December 2, 1898, and to its subsequent offers to the honorable Secretary of State, and finally to its official proposition of February 27 last, all of which contain the proffer and urgent invitation that the President or Congress make the fullest investigation of the canal works, plans, seven concessions, and status of the New Panama Company; and it also refers to the official report upon the canal made by the International Technical Commission November 16, 1898, and placed in your hands by us on December 2 last.

The said act of Congress is therefore in full accord with our repeated offers and our warmest desires.

We again most respectfully renew our proffer of the fullest investigation and our offer of all the facilities to that end. But the subject is of such transcendent consequence to the United States, to the people of the world as well as to ourselves, that we venture, with due respect, to submit this our petition that any commission designated to aid you in making the investigation and comparison contemplated by the act of Congress be composed of gentlemen of the widest experience, of exceptional character and unquestioned professional standing, and who are not embarrassed by public commitals or previous records favorable or unfavorable to either one or the other project and who have not heretofore served upon any canal commission.

The New Panama Canal Company does not present or suggest any name for membership of any commission. Its only petition is that the selection be of gentlemen whose conclusion will at once command public confidence, fully relying upon its ability to satisfy fair and impartial investigation of the merits of its canal.

THE NEW PANAMA CANAL COMPANY,
By MAURICE HUTIN, Director-General.
SULLIVAN & CROMWELL, General Counsel.

What does that mean? Walker and Haupt and Hains had been appointed by the President upon the Nicaragua Canal Commission and had made their report adverse to this company, and here the New Panama Canal Company come in and make their bow to the President of the United States, and politely suggest to him that they think it would be very much better that he should not appoint any gentleman who has been upon any former commission, and the President forthwith appointed all three of them on the next commission. That was his way of answering such insolence.

Mr. Cromwell then proceeded, in New Jersey, under the general laws of that State, to take out a charter for the proposed company to carry out his offer to the President. It would require a long recital to set forth the wild absurdity of its alleged powers.

It is impossible to conceive of any law paper that is more grotesquely absurd. One is left in doubt, after reading this charter, whether it could have been intended as a serious proposition,

Some reference to the dates of Congressional proceedings will account for the frantic activity of Cromwell in pushing these schemes on the attention of the President and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and select committees, and on an Isthmian Canal Committee; and Mr. Lampre and General Abbot admit that the purpose was to defeat legislation in favor of the Nicaragua Canal.

General Abbot was a member of the Comité Technique that made the report on the 2d of December, 1898, which was sent to the President, that Mr. Cromwell adopted as the basis of his seductive letters to the President, and he is still in the employ of the New Panama Canal Company and was summoned by the opposition to the House bill to testify on the hearings before the committee. He appeared on the 4th day of March, 1902, and on cross-examination he testified as follows.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate by reading that, but I will merely state the substance of it, which is that General Abbot, who had been in Paris with M. Hutin and M. Choron, the chief engineer of the company, took ship immediately and came here and went before the Hepburn committee of the House. After a most excruciating experience in trying to refresh his memory he arrived at the conclusion, after coming here, that the object was to prevent legislation in favor of the Nicaragua Canal.

M. Choron's testimony is set out here, not in full, but all that relates to the subject is to the same effect, and I will ask leave to insert that and the other testimony in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the request of the Senator will be complied with. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The testimony as given by General Abbot is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Were you the only member of the committee that was retained in the service of the company?

General ABBOT. As far as I know, I am; I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. You were employed immediately, were you?

General ABBOT. Yes; I had been doing work for the company in Paris, in studying this Chagres problem. I had done a good deal of work in that way as a member of the Comité Technique, and had written a number of memoirs on the subject in the line of my duty. Being interested in keeping up the record of the Chagres River to date, the company wanted that work continued.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recollect about what time in 1900, what month and what date, you arrived in New York from Paris?

General ABBOT. I arrived in New York from Paris late in October.

The CHAIRMAN. 1900?

General ABBOT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You must have been here before that, because you testified on the 17th of January, 1899, before the committee of the House of Representatives.

General ABBOT. That was a special matter, for which I crossed from Paris and returned as soon as I had given my testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. You came over on purpose to give your testimony?

General ABBOT. We came over—we were summoned before the committee, and the company wanted me to appear here, inasmuch as I understand the English language, and to be present at the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you summoned in Paris or here?

General ABBOT. I really don't know. I had no summons individually at all. I simply came at the request of the company with its other officers to present the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that request was made in Paris?

General ABBOT. I really do not know. All I know about it came from the company. I did not receive any request from the committee of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. You received the request in Paris?

General ABBOT. From the company, certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. And you crossed the ocean so as to attend before the committee of the House of Representatives?

General ABBOT. I was not so informed. I was informed by the company that they would be very glad if I would accompany their delegation to the United States to assist them in presenting their case to the Government, and I came over with that object.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you then a member of the Comité Technique, or were you employed by the company in any other capacity?

General ABBOT. I was a member of the Comité Technique at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. After you went back in March, your labors terminated on that committee, and you were then employed by the company as a consulting engineer?

General ABBOT. Yes; in the latter capacity since about the middle of 1900.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you remain in France or come here?

General ABBOT. I remained in France for three or four months and then I came here.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the particular business on which the company sent you to the United States?

General ABBOT. I do not understand the question.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the particular business on which the company sent you to the United States?

General ABBOT. If you mean in 1899, it was to assist their officers in presenting the case clearly before the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been engaged in that from that time to this?

General ABBOT. No.

The CHAIRMAN. What other work have you done for the company here?

General ABBOT. I have reduced the notes, the monthly records of the Chagres River, and of the meteorological observations, forwarded from Panama. They are forwarded from Panama to me here, and they come, of course, in the form of undigested material. I study them and deduce from them the daily discharges, etc., of the Chagres River at Alajuela, Gamboa, and Bohio, etc. I put the information into such form that it can be used for engineering purposes, and forwarded one copy of it to Paris and the other copy I have been forwarding to the Isthmian Canal Commission. That is all my connection with the company here.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, at the time you appeared here as a witness Mr. Choron also appeared?

General ABBOT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. He was then the chief engineer of the company, was he not?

General ABBOT. He is now.

The CHAIRMAN. And Mr. Cromwell appeared?

General ABBOT. Mr. Cromwell was the leading counsel of the company.

The CHAIRMAN. And Mr. Curtis appeared?

General ABBOT. Mr. Curtis is a partner of Mr. Cromwell.

The CHAIRMAN. Those were all the witnesses that were brought before that committee of which Mr. Hepburn was the chairman?

General ABBOT. I gave my testimony, if I recollect rightly, on that matter.

The CHAIRMAN. What particular reason was there for that assemblage of witnesses here just at that time?

General ABBOT. The reason was simply this, as I understand it: The Panama Company had no intention whatever of completing its canal otherwise than by the usual method of raising the funds up to the time of the Spanish-American war. They were thoroughly familiar with the problem in Nicaragua; they knew that no private company could possibly compete with the Panama Company, and they made no attempt to make known what they were doing on the Isthmus. They were working as a private company in their line of business, because they had no fear of any private company operating in Nicaragua.

But as soon as the Oregon went around the Horn and this great enthusiasm arose in America for an isthmian canal, a new possibility was presented to the company—the possibility of the United States Government building a parallel canal, which would have a bad effect on their interests in two respects; first, by rendering it more difficult to raise funds from private sources, with a probability of having to compete with a great Government running a parallel line; and, secondly, because the company would need some 15,000 or 20,000 of those West Indian negroes to complete the work. The American company would demand a like number of laborers, and there would consequently be a competition which would raise the price of labor and also increase the cost of the construction of the canal.

For those reasons the company decided that it was important to inform this Government officially as to what they had done and what they were doing, so that the changed conditions at Panama should be understood here, and that our Government should understand how much better a canal could be made via Panama than via Nicaragua. This knowledge, perhaps, might induce our Government to reconsider the route, and perhaps to take stock or in some other manner assist the company in its great enterprise and thus assure the construction of the best possible canal, and not the canal through Nicaragua.

To accomplish this object it was necessary to present the facts fully before the Government, and that was the object of the company when Mr. Hutin came here and presented a copy of the report of the Comité Technique to the President within a month after it was signed. From that time on the company has desired that the United States Government should know what it is doing, and should appreciate its claims, that Panama offers the best possible route for the isthmian canal.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you got here and you testified on the 17th of January, 1899?

General ABBOT. Yes; about that date. I do not have the exact date in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. You left Paris some time before that?

General ABBOT. I left Paris just before that and came directly here.

The CHAIRMAN. You came in company with Mr. Choron?

General ABBOT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And who else?

General ABBOT. M. Hutin. I think those were the only officers of the company.

The CHAIRMAN. You came here on purpose to make a statement before the committee in the House of Representatives?

General ABBOT. M. Hutin asked me to come here with them, as neither of them speak English and they thought that I could understand the technical questions better than they could, perhaps; and they therefore wished me to come with them and assist them in presenting the case to the United States Government.

The CHAIRMAN. On the 21st day of January, 1899, a bill had passed the Senate of the United States for the purpose of aiding this Maritime Canal Company by a vote of 48 to 6.

General ABBOT. I had forgotten that fact. In fact, I do not know that I ever knew it. I had nothing to do with those matters.

The CHAIRMAN. But your company knew about it?

General ABBOT. I do not know. Perhaps they knew it.

The CHAIRMAN. And thereupon your delegation set out to come to the United States?

General ABBOT. Not at all in connection with that, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Why do you say so when you do not know?

General ABBOT. Because I know very well that it was the passage of the Oregon around Cape Horn that first suggested the idea.

The CHAIRMAN. When did the Oregon go around Cape Horn?

General ABBOT. In the early days of the Spanish war. I can not give you the exact date. The popular excitement caused by it in connection with an isthmian canal put an entirely new face on the question in the United States. People who had up to that time been lukewarm afterwards became enthusiastic advocates of the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand you to say that practically your mission from Paris in the company of those two gentlemen, coming to Washington, had relation to the passage of the Oregon around Cape Horn, and not relation, so far as you know, to the passage of a bill in the United States Senate, by a vote of 6 to 46, to aid the Maritime Canal Company?

General ABBOT. If I knew about that vote at the time I have forgotten it. It had nothing to do with my coming, so far as I was concerned. I simply came to assist these gentlemen in the presentation of technical matters before the Government. It had become very important to the company to have the United States Government know what they were doing, owing to the interest in a canal caused by the passage of the Oregon around the Horn.

The CHAIRMAN. Did that company at that time propose to sell this canal to the United States?

General ABBOT. I do not think they wanted to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they try to get a loan from the United States?

General ABBOT. No. As I understood the idea of the company, they wanted the United States to do with them what England did with the Suez Canal. England opposed, as we all know, with the utmost violence the construction of that canal. When they found that they could not stop it, they then, through one of the most brilliant diplomatic strokes that Disraeli ever directed, bought up the reserve stock of the Khedive.

Rumor has it that Disraeli paid £5,000,000 for what is now worth £20,000,000 and what has paid large interest ever since. I imagine that the idea of the company was that the United States might be willing to guarantee their bonds on stock security and a controlling vote on the board of directors, the company being reincorporated in America, and in that way it could raise funds and thus prevent competition with a parallel route. That was my idea. I did not get that understanding officially, but I inferred that.

General ABBOT. The company did not come with any idea of enlightening the Congress of the United States on the matter. They came here to prevent the serious injury to their interests which would result from the Government of the United States starting a parallel line at the time when they were about trying to raise funds for the completion of their works, and also to prevent a probable rise in the price of labor by the construction of two canals at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I want you to listen to that last answer which you made and see if you have stated what you desire.

The last answer made by General Abbot was repeated to him.

General ABBOT. That is my understanding, but I do not represent the company in expressing it. It is my honest belief.

The CHAIRMAN. What company do you refer to, or what line do you refer to there as a parallel line?

General ABBOT. The Nicaragua line.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you came for the purpose of persuading the Government of the United States not to build the Nicaragua Canal?

General ABBOT. We came to let the United States Government see what their true interest was—full knowledge of the facts would be the best thing for the United States as well as for the company.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you not here now for that same purpose?

General ABBOT. I am here to-day because I was summoned by you.

The CHAIRMAN. No; I did not. Mr. HANNA summoned you.

General ABBOT. Well, Senator HANNA. I am here under orders.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you not brought here for the purpose of doing that same thing—that is, preventing the Government of the United States from selecting the route parallel to the Panama route?

General ABBOT. That is a question for Senator HANNA to answer.

M. Lampre, the general secretary of the Panama Canal Company, testified as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. What was the actual purpose and object of the letter to the President of the United States and the letters and telegrams of Cromwell, attorney, given with the message of the President of February, 1900? What was the actual purpose and object of the letter to the President of the United States of the 18th day of November, 1898?

Mr. LAMPRE. As far as I can recollect, the purpose was to lay the whole subject before the United States; and at the time we stated that should the United States abandon the idea of constructing the Nicaragua Canal we were ready to reorganize under the laws of this country and to organize an American corporation to complete the Panama Canal, which we thought the best route and still think the best route. That is why we laid the whole subject before the United States at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. In addition to this cheerful picture of the resources of the company, these letters boast of the conciliation of Colombia, and that the entire feasibility and practicability of completing the canal is established by the members of two commissions who were the most distinguished men in their professions. Why did not a canal that was so well fortified in its appeal to public confidence obtain the money to complete it by subscriptions among the French people who had already sunk $250,000,000 in it and only had the ditch, the buildings, the machinery, and the material on hand to show for this expenditure?

M. LAMPRE. Just as I told you, Senator, on account of the contemplated building by the United States of the Nicaragua Canal.

COMPAGNIE NOUVELLE DU CANAL DE PANAMA,
45 Wall Street, New York City, March 11, 1899.

To the PRESIDENT:

Referring to the act of Congress approved on the 4th instant respecting an investigation of the Panama and Nicaragua canals, the New Panama Canal Company, as one of the subjects of the inquiry, respectfully invites attention to its communication addressed to you December 2, 1898, and to its subsequent offers to the honorable Secretary of State, and finally to its official proposition of February 27 last, all of which contain the proffer and urgent invitation that the President or Congress make the fullest investigation of the canal works, plans, seven concessions, and status of the New Panama Company; and it also refers to the official report upon the canal made by the International Technical Commission November 16, 1898, and placed in your hands by us on December 2 last.

The said act of Congress is therefore in full accord with our repeated offers and our warmest desires.

We again most respectfully renew our proffer of the fullest investigation and our offer of all the facilities to that end. But the subject is of such transcendent consequence to the United States, to the people of the world as well as to ourselves, that we venture, with due respect, to submit this our petition that any commission designated to aid you in making the investigation and comparison contemplated by the act of Congress be composed of gentlemen of the widest experience, of exceptional character and unquestioned professional standing, and who are not embarrassed by public committals or previous records favorable or unfavorable to either one or the other project and who have not heretofore served upon any canal commission.

The New Panama Canal Company does not present or suggest any name for membership of any commission. Its only petition is that the selection be made of gentlemen whose conclusion will at once command public confidence, fully relying upon its ability to satisfy fair and impartial investigation of the merits of its canal.

THE NEW PANAMA CANAL COMPANY,
By MAURICE HUTIN, Director-General.
SULLIVAN & CROMWELL, General Counsel.

Did that letter receive the approval of your company?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you proposed to dictate to the President of the United States whom he should not appoint on that board?

M. LAMPRE. We did not propose to dictate anything. We asked what we thought we would like to get.

The CHAIRMAN. Is not this a plain dictation: "You shall not appoint any one who has been a member of the board heretofore?"

M. LAMPRE. We did not propose to dictate anything, but only expressed our sincere desire as to that. We would not presume to dictate anything to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. That particular feature of this case, followed by another, led me to suppose that we might expect any overture from your company that might be brought to our attention without respect to whether it was one that we ought properly to consider or not. That is the impression made on my mind, and I want to be frank in stating it to you. Any explanation necessary to be made about that, of course, is in order.

M. LAMPRE. I have nothing to say to that.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice here that Mr. Boyard, under the date of Paris, January 6, 1900, says: "Board of management has resigned."

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the new corporation?

M. LAMPRE. No, sir; the board of management may resign and new directors are appointed; that does not change the corporation at all with us.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not say that it changes the corporation.

M. LAMPRE. I understood you to say it was a new corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. I said the board of management of the new corporation. The next intervention of your company was of the 30th day of April, 1900. That was at the time the Hepburn bill was under consideration, and a day had been set aside as stated in the letter here, which I will enter in the record, but I will not read all of it, unless you want me to read it.

M. LAMPRE. No.

The letter referred to is as follows:

"WASHINGTON, April 30, 1900.

"The PRESIDENT:

"Permit us to refer to the communication addressed to you on February 28, 1899, by the Compagnie Nouvelle du Canal de Panama, and of which we attach a copy for your convenience.

"Three days after the above communication (and which was similar to that addressed to the River and Harbor Committee of the House, Hon. Theodore E. Burton, chairman) Congress enacted the law of March 3, 1899.

"Under the powers of said act the President appointed the 'Isthmian Canal Commission,' composed of Rear-Admiral John G. Walker, Hon. Samuel Pasco, Mr. Alfred Noble, C. E.; Mr. George S. Morison, C. E.; Gen. Peter C. Hains, Prof. William H. Burr, C. E.; Gen. Oswald H. Ernst, Prof. Emory R. Johnson, Mr. Lewis M. Haupt, C. E.

"In addition to its examination of all other possible isthmian routes the Isthmian Canal Commission has made an exhaustive examination of the plans and status of the company at Paris, where the records of twenty years are preserved, and also personally has examined upon the Isthmus of Panama the actual canal and canal works of the company and the feasibility of its undertaking, and at this time is further verifying surveys, plans, and specifications with a force of 700 to 800 men in the field.

"The Isthmian Canal Commission has not yet made its report to the President, and, as we are advised, has not yet completed its investigations and inquiries upon the technical and other subjects covered by the said act of March 3, 1899, nor has the President yet communicated to Congress his recommendations in the premises.

"In all these investigations concerning the Panama Canal the company has made to the Isthmian Canal Commission the fullest exposition and explanations, without reserve or exception, upon every aspect of the subject concerning which the Commission has desired information, and also has delivered to the Commission full and detailed plans, maps, and specifications of the company for the complete excavation and construction of the Panama Canal and canal works. These documents are great in volume and value, and represent the expenditure of a vast sum, as well as the results of many years of study in their original preparation.

"The company has avoided any action or course which might by the Government be deemed inconsistent with its said communication of February 28, 1899.

"All this the company has done in full reliance upon the avowed purpose of the Government (as embodied in the act of March 3, 1899) of thoroughly and exhaustively investigating and reporting upon all possible isthmian canal routes, and in the reasonable expectation that in the meantime no action would be taken upon the subject by the Congress of the United States inconsistent with the expressed purposes of said act.

"On the contrary, however, and presumably without knowledge of the foregoing facts, measures have been introduced in Congress and are to be acted upon in the House of Representatives May 1 and May 2, 1900, having for their purpose the adoption by the Government of another isthmian canal route, without awaiting the recommendation of the President and the information, report, and conclusions of the Isthmian Canal Commission appointed by the President under the act of March 3, 1899.

"We therefore respectfully request that the President advise the Congress of the facts of the case.

"We have the honor to be, your obedient servants,

"SULLIVAN & CROMWELL,
"General Counsel Compagnie Nouvelle du Canal de Panama."

The CHAIRMAN. It is stated here:

"On the contrary, however, and presumably without knowledge of the foregoing facts, measures have been introduced in Congress and are to be acted upon in the House of Representatives May 1 and May 2, 1900"—

Those are the dates that were set apart by unanimous consent or by the rule of the House for the consideration of what was called the Hepburn bill, the same bill that was passed by the House the other day—"having for their purpose the adoption by the Government of another isthmian-canal route, without awaiting the recommendation of the President and the information, report, and conclusions of the Isthmian Canal Commission appointed by the President under the act of March 3, 1899.

"We therefore respectfully request that the President advise the Congress of the facts of the case.

"We have the honor to be, your obedient servants,

"SULLIVAN & CROMWELL,
"General Counsel Compagnie Nouvelle du Canal de Panama."

Were they authorized to make that communication?

M. LAMPRE. Most likely they were. I do not know about it. I have no recollection of that at all.

The CHAIRMAN. I was very much in hopes that the company did not know anything about it.

M. LAMPRE. I do not know; I can not tell.

M. BŒUFVÉ. Is it not countersigned by M. Hutin?

The CHAIRMAN. No; but it is signed by Sullivan & Cromwell, general counsel of the company.

M. LAMPRE. He must have acted under the general powers he had as counsel of the company.

The CHAIRMAN. Very good; that binds the company?

M. LAMPRE. I can not say that it does not. I do not know as to that.

The CHAIRMAN. It is addressed to the President of the United States, in the name of the Panama Canal Company, requesting the President of the United States to communicate certain facts by a message—he could not do it in any other way—to the House of Representatives or to Congress upon the statement here that "on the contrary, however, and presumably without knowledge of the foregoing facts, measures have been introduced in Congress, and are to be acted upon by the House of Representatives May 1 and May 2, 1900, having for their purpose the adoption by the Government of another isthmian canal route"—

That is, the Nicaragua route—

"without awaiting the recommendation of the President and the information, report, and conclusions of the Isthmian Canal Commission appointed by the President under the act of March 3, 1899."

That of course is an intervention on the part of these attorneys with the proper privileges and duties of a House of Congress.

M. LAMPRE. I do not know. The letter is not familiar to me. I could hardly presume to answer.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not suppose it was. I wanted to direct your attention to it. That now is the latest intervention which has been made here for the purpose of interrupting, deferring, preventing action by Congress on this great subject and free choice on the part of the Congress and the people of the United States as between the two canal routes of Nicaragua and Panama, or upon the question whether they will build any or have anything to do with either of them.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, these statements establish positively that all the movements of Mr. Cromwell, from the beginning of his conduct of affairs of the company in the United States, were directed to the purpose of defeating the Nicaraguan Canal movement, whether by the Government or by the Maritime Canal Company. If the Nicaraguan Canal could be defeated, the way was open to the Panama Canal, and in any event they had a paying property in the Panama Railroad.

The extraordinary folly and presumption of his letter to the President of the 28th of February, 1899, was intended to show the President that if Congress was willing to accept stock in a canal company he would remove the Panama Canal Company bodily from France and put all its assets into a New Jersey corporation and give the United States the privilege of becoming a stockholder and of appointing directors in the New Panama Canal Company of America.

The later letters, which I have just read, show that when Cromwell failed to ensnare the President with his New Jersey corporation scheme, he attacked the lion in his den and made direct and almost open war on the Nicaragua Canal bill, reported to the House in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and passed by the House on the 2d of May, 1900, by a very strong majority.

The bill was delayed in the Senate until the Fifty-sixth Congress expired, and Mr. Cromwell had a rest from active operations.

In the Fifty-first Congress Mr. Sherman made a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations in favor of the Nicaragua Canal. He made a second report in the Fifty-second Congress.

In the Fifty-third Congress Mr. MORGAN made a like report from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

In the Fifty-fourth Congress Mr. MORGAN made a like report from the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

In the Fifty-fifth Congress Mr. MORGAN made a like report from the select committee, and the bill passed the Senate on the 21st day of January, 1899, by a vote of 48 yeas to 6 nays. A previous vote had been taken on one of these bills. It passed the Senate by a vote of 11 majority. For the last bill the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] voted. On the first occasion he was not here.

This action of the Senate put Mr. Cromwell in the state of agitation that caused him to address his first letter to the President, on the day of which I have read to the Senate.

In October, 1895, Ludlow's report in favor of the Nicaragua Canal was made to the President, and on June 1, 1896, the Committee of the House on Interstate and Foreign Commerce made a searching examination into the entire subject and reported a bill to construct a canal on the Nicaraguan route.

On the 17th of January, 1899, the House committee, of which Mr. HEPBURN was chairman, began a full and searching examination of the whole subject of the canal.

Mr. William Nelson Cromwell was the first witness to be examined, and he took charge of the French forces as general in chief, legal counsel, diplomatic functionary, orator, and witness for the Panama Canal Company.

He produced General Abbot, who was examined at great length, and Mr. Choran, chief engineer of the Panama Canal Company, who was also examined at great length and made a supplemental statement of 10 pages of printed matter in behalf of Panama.

Mr. Fteley made a written statement covering 33 pages of printed matter in small type.

Mr. Cromwell was assisted by Mr. Curtis in conducting the examinations and both broke in with their statements when it was found necessary.

The witnesses for Nicaragua on that occasion were Alexander T. Mason, Hiram Hitchcock, and Lewis M. Haupt. The committee made no report on the Senate bill, but took a bold departure from the policy of Government aid to the Maritime Canal Company and adopted the policy of ownership, construction, and complete control of a canal by the United States, and the first Hepburn bill was accordingly reported to the House on the 7th day of December, 1899.

In the meantime, on December 1, 1900, President McKinley had entered into agreements with Costa Rica and Nicaragua which he knew would close the controversy and shut off Mr. Cromwell's intrusions into legislation relating to the canal.

The President passed to his new and greater estate believing that he had settled the canal question, if Congress would authorize the President to acquire the right to do so from Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

He understood the reasons for the choice he made as well as any man who has survived him, having been fully informed by Mr. Cromwell and other agents of the Panama Canal Company as to every fact and plea and finesse and misrepresentation they had to make. It is a shameful reflection on Mr. McKinley to say that he did not have the opportunity to understand the Panama route when he chose the Nicaragua route.

But what respect has Mr. Cromwell, or anyone who is opposed to any canal, for the decision made by Mr. McKinley, when the occasion is again presented for further delay and final defeat of the will of the American people at the behest of the great railroads?

In the opening of this Congress the House again took up the Hepburn bill and passed it. Cromwell was, for the first time, belated by nine days' interval of time.

The Senator from Ohio has graphically depicted the sad period, but Cromwell rose to the occasion and opened a new campaign. I refer only to what the record discloses of his action. I would not dare to follow him when he is not on the surface.

His next appearance was, as counsel for the Panama Canal Company, in the rôle of chief negotiator for Colombia, in formulating the draft of the proposed convention that is before the Senate as the expression of the purposes of Colombia as to the granting of canal rights to the United States.

He puts another letter into the diplomatic files, which is to stand as the key of interpretation of the convention in any future misunderstanding that may occur. It is sent to Congress as part of the Colombian draft of a convention.

When we wish to know what that convention means we must refer to this letter.

It is attended with a disgusting cajolery and sycophancy that only too well indicates that it is intended to mislead Congress.

Mr. Cromwell's final appearance, in the open, is his letter of indorsement and explanation appended to the report of the minority of the committee. Why was he not called before the committee, as Mr. Pasco was, to swear to his opinions, if they are so important? It is plain enough for common comprehension that Mr. Cromwell could not afford to appear to support his attack upon the Nicaragua route.

The friends of Nicaragua could not call him as a witness without indorsing him, and could not compel him to disclose professional secrets to the disadvantage of his clients.

The Cromwellian phase of the situation is not likely to commend the Panama Canal Company or its ditch to the favor of the American people.

Mr. President, I have now shown the circumstances under which this matter has been brought before the Congress and before the Senate to-day, and I have shown how the discerning eye of the President and of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House saw through this pretender, trapped him as he came along with his cajolery and his seductive offers, and how they have disregarded him.

But it seems, Mr. President, that we can not shake him off. I presume he is in the gallery now, listening to me. He has been here all the time during this debate. The word "Panamaist" in Paris to-day is as much a synonym of a scoundrel as any word that was ever invented to define a bad character in our provincialism. I do not foresee what the result may be if we take up that corporation and do what Colombia says, "Go to them first and deal with them, settle with them, and then come to us."

Sir, I propose that if the Government of the United States has to deal in respect of property with any foreign person it shall find at least some authorized diplomatic agent to stand up in company with our diplomatic agent, to bind a government, to bind somebody beside a private individual or corporation in a contract which relates to the affairs of the whole world.

Why shall we go into a diplomatic correspondence or a dicker with the Panama Canal Company in order to do that which is provided for in the Spooner amendment at the round sum of $40,000,000? If we are to take it, why is not our agent permitted to have some judgment about its actual value? Why is the round sum put up, and why is it provided that more or less shall not be given as the price of it?

Mr. President, without reference to its connection with Nicaragua or any other thing or anybody else, it appears to me that the Government of the United States was never put into such a humiliating position as it will be in when our agents go to M. Hutin, or whoever may be the new president, the man put in in order to make the forty-million-dollar bid, and make an arrangement with him to discuss what he proposes to do in selling the property to the United States. The proposed treaty requires that we shall settle with that company, the company being authorized by Colombia to do it, before we go to Colombia for the purpose of obtaining concessionary rights to go through the State of Colombia with a canal.

The Panama Canal Company can not be a party to a diplomatic agreement with the United States. If it turns out that, by fraud, or through our mistake, we are cheated out of money, that we are deceived, what remedy have we? We have merely to turn our backs and walk off from a transaction with which we had no business to have anything to do.

If, however, the Government of Colombia will come forward and say, "We think the property is worth $40,000,000, and you can have it for $40,000,000, which we will distribute, and another million dollars," (which they have put into the treaty and which is not in the $40,000,000, to be paid at once for its ownership of stock in the Panama Canal Company), "and seven millions advance payment for fourteen years of rent at $500,000 a year for a canal while you are building it, we will guarantee you against France, guarantee you against the creditors of the Panama Canal Company, although some of them are American citizens" (for there are a number of them in the United States); "we will guarantee you against all the speculators and peculators" (who have been running through the market to pick up the bonds since we have been at work about it); "we will guarantee you against the women and the children who have no representation in this matter, and whose rights have been cut down by legal technicality or mistake" (they can not guarantee us against the abuse of our own character by accepting a proposition surrounded with such evidences of frightful wrong and injustice), then we might say, "We will accept your proposition, it being extremely beneficial to us and better than any we ever dreamed we could get. We will accept your proposition for the reason that we can hold you to your bargain. If it turns out otherwise, and some court in France, or in Colombia, or in the United States, or elsewhere should hold in favor of one of these little innocent children, that they had a right of lien upon the property, you, Colombia, are bound to make it good to us."

But as we have nobody to deal with but this corporation, the Panama Canal Company, that is now in articulo mortis, it is a very bad outlook for the United States. It is a degrading, a cheapening, and a bad outlook for the United States to engage in any such transaction. We have no business committing the honor of this country to any such transaction. Senators may find in acts of friendship that they think they owe to leading Senators or others in this country some excuse for accepting such a situation, but I have no such responsibilities and no such inducements to lead me from what I consider to be the path of duty; and I will not consent that this Government, after an experience that has been disagreeable in the past, shall have any dealings with the Panama Canal Company. Let that company deal with Colombia, with the consent of France, and let Colombia at least offer us a title that is warranted to be free of all incumbrance.

APPENDIX.

[House Report No. 2615, Fifty-second Congress, second session.]

INVESTIGATION OF PANAMA CANAL.

March 3, 1893, laid on the table and ordered to be printed. May 9, 1900, ordered reprinted by the Senate.

Mr. Fellows, from the Special Committee to Investigate the Panama Canal Company, etc., submitted the following report.

The Committee on Rules, to whom were referred the resolutions heretofore introduced by Mr. Fellows and Mr. Geary, respectively, reported the same back with the recommendation that the resolution herewith submitted be adopted in lieu thereof, viz:

"Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate and report as to what sums of money, if any, were expended by the Panama Canal Company, or its promoters, directly or indirectly, for the purpose of preventing opposition in this country to the plans of said company, or securing acquiescence in America thereto, and what disposition was made of such sums; and generally as to the situation of affairs upon the Isthmus so far as American commerce seeking transit across the same may be concerned; and also as to the contracts and relations between the Pacific Mail Steamship Company and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the Transcontinental Railroad Association, and other railroads; and as to what contracts or other collusive arrangements have been made by said companies whereby the traffic by way of the Isthmus of Panama has been suppressed or diminished; and as to whether said steamship company, by virtue of said contracts or otherwise, has been practically absorbed by or subjected to the control of said railroad companies; and as to whether the business which it was the design of this Government to foster by the sums granted to said steamship company, through mail contracts or otherwise, has been thereby diverted from the Isthmus of Panama and the Panama Railroad Company to such transcontinental companies; and as to whether such acts are detrimental to the interests of American maritime commerce and the producers, manufacturers, and merchants of the United States; and if such abuses are found to exist, by what means the same can or should be suppressed, and as to whether the further grant of said sums to said steamship company should be withdrawn. Said committee shall have the power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and the expenses incurred in said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and said committee shall have leave to sit during the sessions of the House in Washington or elsewhere."

Your committee, to which was referred the foregoing resolution, finds itself confronted with the fact that this session will close within a few days and that some report is demanded during the very last week of an expiring Congress.

The matters referred to in the resolution are so varied and distinct in their nature that while the committee finds itself able authoritatively to report on certain of the subjects contained in it, feeling confident that the true facts have been thoroughly disclosed, as to other matters referred your committee does not feel that same confidence, and should the House desire further investigation of some of the subjects embraced in this resolution your committee does not feel justified in saying that no ground for such action exists.

Your committee has not felt itself compelled to go through the great mass of diplomatic papers and correspondence which has accumulated during the present century between various foreign powers and the United States on the subject of transit across the Isthmus of Panama. Your committee has examined the matter sufficiently to be able to say that as far as the treaty of 1846 with New Granada is concerned, and so far as the concession granted to and contracts made with the present Panama Railroad corporation, there is no clear ground for the assertion that any exclusive right to cross the Isthmus was ever in terms granted, or by implication secured, either to an American corporation or to citizens of the United States, to the exclusion of citizens of any other country.

The original concession to Howland and Aspinwall was simply the transfer of the concession theretofore given to a French corporation, which concession had been surrendered back to the Government of New Granada. The rights of the Panama Railroad Company are simply those conveyed to it by Howland and Aspinwall, affirmed and modified only by subsequent contracts with the Government of New Granada. There does not seem to be any ground, so far as the evidence adduced before this committee goes, for the claim that the Government of New Granada or the United States of Colombia has ever guaranteed that the United States shall control the transit, or place any limitation on the legal rights of shareholders in the railway company or restriction in the nationality of the owners of its stock.

The Panama Railroad is a corporation under the laws of New York, and its directory and the rights of ownership of its shares are governed by the laws of that State.

Your committee being instructed to ascertain whether any sums of money were expended by the Panama Canal Company or its promoters for the purpose of preventing opposition in this country to the plans of said canal, has done its utmost in the limited time before the end of the present Congress to investigate this matter. It has been unable thus far to trace directly or indirectly the expenditure of any money whatever in a corrupt way to influence the legislative or executive action of the United States Government. It may be that no investigation, however prolonged, after this lapse of time could be efficient in making such discovery, even if such corrupt use of money was made; but this is the subject of which your committee does not desire authoritatively to express its opinion that further investigation would be entirely fruitless.

Certain facts in relation to the expenditure of money on the part of the canal company, however, are distinctively proven.

In the year 1879 the original subscription to the stock of the Panama Company was opened in France, of which country the canal company, by its technical name of the Universal Inter-Oceanic Canal Company, is a corporation. The original subscription was an entire failure, and great weight must be given to the opinion that it was a failure principally on account of the distrust as to the attitude of the United States toward this canal project which was universally entertained in Europe.

It is a fact too well known to have required testimony to be offered that the entire tone of the executive branch of this Government during the Administration of President Hayes, and the entire current of our diplomatic correspondence, was one of intense loyalty to the idea that not merely no foreign government, but no foreign corporation indirectly supported or controlled by any foreign government, should ever obtain any right to construct a canal across the Isthmus. In fact, during the two years preceding the close of the Hayes Administration the correspondence of our Government was kept within ordinary diplomatic courtesy of protest on this subject only by the belief, which results have proved to be well founded, that the canal constructed on the plans and ideas of De Lesseps and his associates was an idle dream, practically hopeless of accomplishment.

It seems clear that the promoters of the canal company saw that no success would attend their efforts to obtain subscriptions in Europe unless the public opinion of America on this subject should either be modified or that the people of Europe should be persuaded that the public opinion of the American people had been modified. De Lesseps visited this country in the winter of 1879-80, and a single instance will show how determined the promoters of the canal were, whatever was the popular opinion in this country, that Europe should be persuaded that it was not hostile to the canal. On the very day of De Lesseps's arrival in Washington President Hayes sent his message to Congress affirming in strong terms the position of his Administration as to the Monroe doctrine in its broadest acceptation.

That message as it appeared in the press was translated to De Lesseps, and his answer was characteristic and immediate. To the amazement of his American friends, who had translated him this message, he at once telegraphed to Paris that the President's message had guaranteed the neutrality of the Panama Canal. This seemed to be the beginning of a great change in the tone of the press of Paris and of France, and from the time of De Lesseps's visit to this country there seemed to be an assurance that America was not hostile, but, on the contrary, very friendly to the enterprise. It was after the return of De Lesseps to France that the decision was made that an American committee of men of prominence whose solid names would be a guaranty of the financial stability of the enterprise should be selected.

The object of this is perfectly clear. It was to give a widespread public impression that American capital, in the persons of some of its most respectable agencies, with ramifications, correspondents, and connections in every financial center of all localities in the United States, was backing the enterprise, and that Americans intended to become shareholders in the canal. It was intended first by the gentlemen who were selected to compose this committee to choose General Grant to lend his name to this enterprise, to give to this American committee not merely financial weight, but the patriotic glory of a great name at the head of it, so as to impress the American people with its international or binational character. General Grant having declined, it was clear that the next best thing to do was to secure the name, as chairman of this committee, of some gentleman widely known, of political experience and postion, and, if possible, one whose orthodoxy in the past in relation to the Monroe doctrine would make his support of the canal project all the stronger in the eyes of the American people.

The American committee, by mutual agreement, under suggestions from the financial agents of the canal company in Paris, had already been composed of the great banking houses of J. & W. Seligman, Drexel, Morgan & Co., and Winslow, Lanier & Co., of New York. Each of these houses was to designate one of its members to form the American committee, and the then Secretary of the Navy, Hon. R. W. Thompson, was decided upon as chairman, and in the autumn of 1880 the offer was made to him, through J. & W. Seligman, to leave the Cabinet and assume the title of the chairman of the American committee, with a salary to be paid at not less than 125,000 francs.

The house of Seligman & Co., of London, in which the New York banking firm of J. & W. Seligman were interested, had been the financial agents of the Navy Department during the Hayes Administration, and personal acquaintance between the Seligmans and Mr. Thompson had been the consequence.

The only testimony obtainable as to the reasons which induced Mr. Thompson to consent to take this step is his own recollection of what was in his mind at that time. He states that after he decided on this step he notified the President of his intention and that the President acquiesced in it; and his resignation, under these circumstances, caused no severance of the personal friendly relations between them. This may be true, but it is difficult to see what the President could have done to show any want of acquiescence when one of his Cabinet tendered his resignation and explained that it was to assume a position of great apparent financial responsibility and importance, with a salary three times greater than he received as head of the Navy Department.

Testimony has been taken showing that this action on the part of the Secretary of the Navy was a great disappointment and surprise to Mr. Hayes, and he so expressed himself to others than Mr. Thompson.

It is clear that the whole tone of the Administration had been suspicious of and hostile toward the enterprise into which Mr. Thompson was willing to go, and it is perfectly clear that had not Mr. Thompson been a member of that Administration no controlling reason existed for his selection as chairman of a committee intrusted, or supposed to be intrusted, with such great financial and commercial responsibilities.

Mr. Thompson tendered his resignation early in December, 1880, and it was formally accepted by the President a few days thereafter. It is significant of the controlling reasons for the haste in which this matter of Mr. Thompson's resignation from the Cabinet was concluded by him, that we find him writing, on December 16, that arrangements should be made that his salary should begin on the 20th of December, in order that his friends might "be assured that his position was fixed beyond a peradventure," and that a promise to this effect "would satisfy his friends and put the Nicaraguans on their backs."

It was at this time that the Forty-sixth Congress appointed a special committee to examine and report on interoceanic routes. At the same time the Committee on Foreign Affairs was charged with the examination and report upon the so-called "Crapo resolution," as to whether the Panama Canal project was a violation of the Monroe doctrine or was detrimental to American interests.

Your committee repeat, that it has not found any evidence to show that any corrupt or improper means were used to stifle the investigation or the discussion of these resolutions. In fact, in spite of the arguments of Mr. Thompson and the counsel employed by him to assist, the Crapo resolution was reported back to the House in a somewhat modified form, but with a report ringing with true American patriotism, and a manly, yet conservative assertion of the Monroe doctrine as it is generally understood in the United States.

The select committee on Interoceanic routes also made a report strongly supporting the idea that the United States should control all transit over the Isthmus—at least in so far as to prevent any European or non-American nation from having a preponderating influence. But it will be remembered that it was at the short session of the Fortieth Congress, with a change of administration coming on the 4th of March, that these reports were made, as the present one will be, just at the close of the session, and your committee can see reasonable ground for the belief that these resolutions and reports were not acted upon simply from the general apathy of the House and the stress of other business at the close of the session.

Your committee find that for the next three or four years Colonel Thompson was exceedingly vigilant in watching the legislation of Congress and most active and able in his efforts and influence to postpone the consideration of any legislation either directly or indirectly tending to work an injury to the cause of the Panama Canal Company. He appeared before committees, House and Senate, personally and by printed arguments and briefs.

These, he thinks, had great weight in the defeat of the Nicaragua Canal plans in whatever shape they came up, but it is not clear that, outside of this, he had anything directly to do with the shaping of public opinion in this country or bringing about what seems to have been an apparent acquiescence, or at least an indifference on the part of the press and the people. So far as the testimony goes, the work of the American committee was altogether done by Mr. Thompson, and consisted of supervising purchases for a part of the time for the construction of the canal, and this persistent, watchful, and successful supervision of the legislation of the United States.

The members of the American committee other than himself were supposed by Mr. Thompson to have received no compensation whatever except their commission as bankers and brokers in obtaining subscriptions and furthering the sale of the stocks and bonds of the canal company and in the handling and transmission of the very large amount of money spent in this country for the purchase of supplies of various kinds. It was the object of the committee to see that to as great an extent as possible the purchase of supplies of raw material, of machinery and tools should be made in the United States as an aid to make it appear that America had no hostility, but every reason to look with a friendly eye on this enterprise.

The total amount of money for purchases of this kind passing through the single house of J. & W. Seligman and distributed to American trade was upward of $40,000,000, and that house is not able to say that no further accounts of money came through other banking houses to be spent in America for similar ends. This, however, was all spent by purchasing agents of the canal company, and their vouchers for their purchases were forwarded to Paris for approval.

There was one thing, however, which struck the only three salaried officers of the Panama Canal Company whose testimony we have been able to get as an entire surprise. This fact is that these three banking houses named above received, apparently for the loan of their names and for nothing else to this enterprise, the immense sum of 6,000,000 francs, or $1,200,000; $400,000 apiece, or $50,000 a year, was paid these houses without the knowledge of the chairman of that committee, who all the time supposed that he was the important factor in this enterprise and was himself receiving only half of that sum annually.

In fact, two years before the canal company went into liquidation it is in evidence that Mr. Thompson voluntarily reduced his salary by one-half—that is, to $12,500, remaining in complete ignorance that the other members of the committee, of which he was still chairman, were still each receiving $50,000. These banking houses state they had no specific duties to render in return for these subsidies; that they had no employment or interest to effect the sale of canal stock or bonds, and that, in fact, practically none were sold in the United States.

What influence was exercised upon the financial public opinion of the United States by the names of these three great banking houses, what indirect credit and popularity was given to the enterprise through their numerous correspondents and connections throughout the country is perhaps impossible now to estimate, but to effect this was the object of the formation of this American committee, a committee which testifies that it had no regular meetings, and some members of which were never present at a meeting or knew whether any minutes were ever kept by the committee, while each of these houses were receiving $400,000. This fact, if it is a measure of the general conduct and management of the Panama Canal Company, may possibly explain why it was compelled to go into liquidation as soon as it did.

The only specific matter the three banking members of the American committee seem to have had in charge and to have accomplished was the purchase of the stock of the Panama Railroad Company by the canal company at a price more than double what it had been quoted in the market for two or three years previous to the beginning of these negotiations. This stock had been selling from $140 to $150, and the result of the negotiations and contract of sale was that the Panama Canal Company purchased 68,500 shares out of the 70,000 shares of stock, at a price of $221—$250 a share for the stock, $41 and some cents on each share for certain "assets" of the railroad company, the nature of which is not very clear.

It may not be out of place to state that in pursuance of this purchase these "assets" were sold to be bought by a "syndicate," and that syndicate was composed of Messrs. J. & W. Seligman; Winslow, Lanier & Co., and Drexel, Morgan & Co., who had been managing the purchase of the Panama Railroad stock on behalf of the canal company. These negotiations and the price paid for this stock by the canal company, however, may not come within the strict purview of the resolution of Congress.

As to the second part of the resolution referred to your committee, relating to the situation in the past few years and at present of American commerce upon the Isthmus, your committee feels that it has obtained all the evidence needed to establish certain facts beyond controversy. On the 1st of February, 1878, the Pacific Mail Company, a corporation organized under the laws of New York, owning and running steamers between New York and Aspinwall on the Atlantic, and between Panama and San Francisco on the Pacific, together with certain intermediate Central American and Mexican ports, made a contract for fifteen years with the Panama Railroad Company, also a corporation under the laws of New York. At that time there was no showing that there were any foreign stockholders in either of these two corporations.

This contract provided that the Pacific Mail should have the exclusive right "to bill freight through" from New York to San Francisco and vice versa over the Panama Railroad, and all freight offered by others between these points could not be "billed through," but would have to pay local rates on the Isthmus railway. The sum paid for this was to be a lump sum of $75,000 a month to the railroad company, which, by modification, was afterwards lowered to $55,000 a month.

A remarkable fact about this contract is that it was the result of a contract made before that time between the Pacific Mail Company and the Transcontinental Railway Pool, as at that date the Association of Transcontinental Railways was called. That was a contract whereby the Transcontinental Railway Pool, embracing all of the roads between the Missouri River and the Pacific seaports, and covering entirely all railway traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, several of which had received large donations of public lands and the bonds of which the United States Government was guaranteeing, paid the Pacific Mail the sum of $90,000 a month, which was afterwards reduced to $75,000 a month, for the consideration that the Pacific Mail would carry only 1,200 tons a month of freight each way between New York and San Francisco, and on that freight would allow the transcontinental pool to fix the price and rate to be paid. That was the upshot of the contract, although the form was a reservation of space for 1,200 tons a month for the exclusive benefit of the Transcontinental Railway roads—whether the steamers sailed full or half empty.

After the passage of the interstate-commerce law had compelled the dissolution of the so-called "pool," a transcontinental railway association was formed, which, under some name or other, is still in existence; and down to the present time the Pacific Mail, subsidized by the Government in a large amount each year, has been allowing the transcontinental railways to fix the rates and limit the traffic over its line. These two contracts were so far practically parts of one and the same that the amount paid the Panama Railroad monthly was fixed with regard to that paid to the Pacific Mail by the transcontinental roads, and when the latter was lowered from $90,000 a month to $75,000 the former was lowered from $75,000 to $55,000. The object of this is frankly stated by the officers of both the transcontinental roads and the Pacific Mail; it was to maintain rates above the level to which they would fall if free competition between these several routes had continued.

It seems to be certain that a very large, if not an absolutely controlling, interest in the stock and the directory of the Pacific Mail Company is owned by individuals and estates very largely interested in the stock and directory of the transcontinental roads; and it is proven that the same individuals composing a majority of the directory of the Pacific Mail composed a majority of the directors present at the meeting of the Panama Railroad Company's directory at which the contract between the Pacific Mail and the railroad company of February 1, 1878, was ratified and executed.

That this system has for fifteen years been diminishing commerce between New York and San Francisco across the Isthmus is not denied. It is stated, as a justification, that the Transcontinental Railway Association, controlling, as it did, under these contracts, the prices and traffic of the Pacific Mail, used the latter as an active factor to defeat the competition of sailing-vessel traffic around Cape Horn, and thus were able to maintain the rates of the railroad companies as against that of sailing-vessel competition. It is obvious that this did not tend to increase American shipping or tend to the encouragement of the merchant marine or the commerce of the United States.

It seems to your committee that this state of things can not be beneficial to the general interstate trade or commerce of the United States, nor can it see that it is of any particular benefit to our trade with foreign countries. It is stated that this arrangement between the Pacific Mail and the Transcontinental Railway Association came to an end in December last, which is just about the time that negotiations between the Panama Railroad Company and the Pacific Mail as to a renewal of the former contract seems to have fallen through. And it is likewise in evidence that the final check to the attempts at making a new contract between the Panama Railroad Company and the Pacific Mail was given by the following letter to the vice-president of the railroad company from the controlling member of the executive committee of the Pacific Mail, who is also universally recognized as one of the controlling influences of the transcontinental railways:

C. P. HUNTINGTON, 23 BROAD STREET,
New York, December 28, 1892.

CHARLES COUDERT, Esq.,
68-70 William Street, New York.

MY DEAR SIR: Herewith I return memorandum that you gave me on Monday. Of course this would not do, but it does seem to me as though there could be such a contract made as would be largely beneficial to both interests.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

Whatever be the case in the last sixty days, it is perfectly clear to your committee that the Panama Railroad Company has for fifteen years been prevented by these arrangements from being a competitor with the transcontinental railway lines.

Your committee recommends that whenever, under provisions of the act of March 3, 1891, "for ocean mail service and to promote commerce," the Postmaster-General shall enter into contract with any line of vessels, a clause shall be inserted in said contract to the effect that if said steamship line shall enter into any combination or arrangement with competing lines of traffic the result of which is to diminish traffic or raise or maintain rates of freight on American commerce, foreign or domestic, over what free competition would effect, that said contract may be terminated forthwith by the Postmaster-General.

Your committee regrets, so far as the ownership of nearly all the stock goes, that the control of any American corporation, as the Panama Railroad is, should be held in foreign hands, particularly in the hands of the liquidator or receiver of another corporation, also foreign-appointed by foreign judicial authority and subject to foreign judicial supervision. It fails to see, however, that any law, treaty stipulation, or contract obligation has been violated by the purchase of these railroad shares by the Panama Canal Company, or that as yet any discrimination has been attempted against American commerce or any injustice practiced thereon on account of such foreign ownership of this stock. The restrictions and injuries American trade and commerce have sustained have been laid on them by American citizens controlling various other American corporations, and it is not a pleasing subject to contemplate.

Your committee can not refrain from calling attention to what seems an obvious deduction from the facts shown, that it is to the interest of the United States that the American people should absolutely control some [illegible] let across the Isthmus at some point, which shall be used for the benef[illegible] of American trade in general as an open and continuous competitor, affording no opportunity for entangling subsidies from great competing lines or chance of falling into the grasp of any monopoly through stock manipulation.

JOHN R. FELLOWS,
Chairman.
T. J. GEARY.
JOSIAH PATTERSON.
H. HENRY POWERS.
BELLAMY STORER.

Mr. QUARLES obtained the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I promised the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that I would ask the Senate to agree that the pending bill should be taken up after the routine morning business to-morrow. He was not feeling very well and did not wish to occupy the latter hours of the evening speaking. I also ask permission to take the floor for the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection to the request, it will be so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Have I unanimous consent for the other order?

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama if there are not other Senators who have given notice, and whose notices are on the Calendar, that they wish to speak to-morrow?

Mr. MORGAN. That will be a question between the other Senators. If there is objection, I will not try to secure the order; but it was my suggestion that the Senator from Wisconsin should be relieved in this way. I did not suppose anybody would object. At all events, I will ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill to-morrow at the conclusion of the routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business to-morrow at the conclusion of the morning business. Is there objection to that request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. The request was "at the conclusion of the routine morning business."

Mr. MORGAN. After the routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the request of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, a few days since I presented to the Senate two amendments to the pending measure, one intended to be proposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the other an amendment to the original bill. Each of these amendments is identical; in other words, one is the same as the other, and is intended to be ingrafted upon whichever measure shall be adopted by the Senate. Since offering those amendments certain amendments have been suggested by various Senators, and I have recast them. I ask that they be reprinted in order that they may be available for examination by Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks that the amendments he has heretofore offered, and which have been recast by him, be reprinted for the use of the Senate. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BACON. I desire that one of the amendments shall be read now, in order that it may be in a position where Senators may conveniently see it. The Secretary will begin at the important part, which is the only part I desire read.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that it be printed in the RECORD without being read.

Mr. SCOTT. It is late; let it be printed.

Mr. BACON. That is sufficient.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. BACON to the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, viz:

On page 2, line 3, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Isthmian Canal Commission hereinafter authorized."

On page 2, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Isthmian Canal Commission under the direction of the President."

On page 3, line 6, strike out the words "Secretary of War" and insert in lieu thereof the words "said Isthmian Canal Commission subject to the approval of the President."

On page 3, at the end of line 9, after the word "defenses," insert the words "or any part thereof."

Add an additional section to said bill, to be known as section 7, as follows:

"SEC. 7. That to enable the President to construct the canal and works appurtenant thereto as provided in this act, there is hereby created the Isthmian Canal Commission, the same to be composed of seven members, who shall be nominated and appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall serve during the pleasure of the President, and one of whom shall be named as the chairman of said Commission. Of the seven members of said Commission at least four of them shall be persons learned and skilled in the science of engineering, and of the four, at least one shall be an officer of the United States Army and at least one other shall be an officer of the United States Navy, the said officers, respectively, being upon the active or the retired list of the Army or of the Navy. Said commissioners shall each receive as their compensation the sum of $10,000 per annum, and such additional allowances for actual expenses incurred as may be allowed by the President in his discretion.

"In addition to the members of said Isthmian Canal Commission, the President is hereby authorized through said Commission to employ in said service any of the engineers of the United States Army, at his discretion, and likewise to employ any engineers in civil life, at his discretion, and any other persons necessary for the proper and expeditious prosecution of said work. The compensation of all such engineers and other persons employed under this act shall be fixed by said Commission, subject to the approval of the President. The official salary of any civil or military officer of the Government appointed or employed under this act shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation fixed under the terms of this act. Said Commission shall in all matters be subject to the direction and control of the President and shall make to the President annually and at such other periods as may be required either by law or by the order of the President full and complete reports of all their actings and doings and all moneys received and expended in the construction of said work and in the performance of their duties in connection therewith, which said reports shall be by the President transmitted to Congress. And the said Commission shall furthermore give to Congress or either House of Congress such information as may be required either by act of Congress or by the order of either House of Congress."

The President shall cause to be provided and assigned for the use of the said commission such offices as may, with the suitable equipment of the same, be necessary and proper, in his discretion, for the proper discharge of the duties thereof.

PERMANENT CENSUS OFFICE.

Mr. QUARLES. I am directed by the Committee on the Census, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6178) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902, to report it without amendment.

I desire to say that it is intended solely to add one word which was carelessly omitted from the permanent census act. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that section 4 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902, shall be amended by inserting, after the word "watchmen" and before the words "and charwomen," where the same occur in section 4, the words "unskilled laborers."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REFUNDING OF CERTAIN TAXES.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13204) to provide for refunding taxes paid upon legacies and bequests for uses of a religious, charitable, or educational character, for the encouragement of art, etc., under the act of June 13, 1898. The bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Finance, and I think it will cause no discussion whatever.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment was to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, sums paid for documentary stamps used on export bills of lading, such stamps representing taxes which were illegally assessed and collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 3. That in all cases where an executor, administrator, or trustee shall have paid, or shall hereafter pay, any tax upon any legacy or distributive share of personal property under the provisions of the act approved June 13, 1898, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," and amendments thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon proper application being made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed, so much of said tax as may have been collected on contingent beneficial interests which shall not have become vested prior to July 1, 1902. And no tax shall hereafter be assessed or imposed under said act approved June 13, 1898, upon or in respect of any contingent beneficial interest which shall not become absolutely vested in possession or enjoyment prior to said July 1, 1902.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 4. That taxes which shall have accrued before the taking effect of the act of April 12, 1902, entitled "An act to repeal war-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," and since July 1, 1900, upon securities delivered or transferred to secure the future payment of money, are hereby remitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question. He says this is a bill which the House has passed?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a House bill, passed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SCOTT. And is recommended by your committee?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; it is recommended by the unanimous vote of our committee.

Mr. SCOTT. It is very sweeping.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for refunding taxes paid upon legacies and bequests for uses of a religious, charitable, or educational character, for the encouragement of art, etc., under the act of June 13, 1898, and for other purposes."

NATIONAL APPALACHIAN FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to have unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 5228) for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, to be known as the "National Appalachian Forest Reserve," after the routine morning business on Saturday. I do not think it will take long to debate it.

Mr. BATE. I should like to hear the Senator's request?

Mr. BURTON. It is that the bill be taken up for consideration at that time.

Mr. BATE. Simply for consideration?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir. The agreement I ask for is not to interfere with conference reports, appropriation bills, or any notices that have heretofore been given.

Mr. ALDRICH. If this is to be a continuing order, I shall be obliged to object to it. As I stated the other day, it seems to me at this time of the session it will not do for us to take up bills for consideration for an indefinite period.

Mr. BURTON. I will not ask that it shall be a continuing order, because I think the Senate will be ready to vote upon the bill after very brief consideration. There have been several speeches made upon the bill; it has had attention called to it, and I think Senators are ready to vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall not object to its being considered in the morning hour of the day named by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BURTON. After the routine morning business on Saturday.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; in the morning hour of that day only.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it to be a request for unanimous consent that the bill named by the Senator from Kansas be made the order of business at the conclusion of the routine morning business on Saturday morning.

Mr. BATE. Not to affect any other business for which notice has been given.

Mr. ALDRICH. And for consideration during the morning hour of that day only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For consideration during the morning hour of Saturday only. Is that the understanding?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands it. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BURTON rose.

Mr. ALDRICH. I withdraw the motion if the Senator from Kansas desires to make a request.

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad if the Senate will be so kind as to pass a bill for me. It is the bill (S. 6070) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at a point to be selected, within 5 miles north of the Kaw River, in Wyandotte County, State of Kansas, and Clay County, State of Missouri, and to make the same a post route. It is a bridge bill, drawn in the usual form, which has been referred to the War Department and reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SCOTT. It is after 6 o'clock.

Mr. KEAN. It is a very long bill.

Mr. SCOTT. It is a very long bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There seems to be objection.

Mr. BURTON. Very well; I will not urge it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 18, 1902, at 11 o'clock a. m.

The following substitute resolution was recommended by the committee:

JOHN DOUGLAS.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I also present from the Committee on Accounts House resolution No. 303.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes, with the disagreement of the Senate to the House amendment and a request for a conference.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. RAY of New York, Mr. OVERSTREET, and Mr. LANHAM.

PERSONAL REQUEST.

By unanimous consent, leave was given to Mr. LANHAM to withdraw from the files of the House the papers accompanying bill H. R. 7271, for the relief of Mrs. M. L. Baker, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ARTICLE VII, TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND SPAIN.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, to-day was set apart to consider bills reported from the Judiciary Committee. We have several bills which we would like to get through; but before calling up the bankruptcy bill there is one other bill which I desire to take up because it is important. I call up the bill (H. R. 12764) amending the act of March 2, 1901, entitled "An act to carry into effect the stipulations of Article VII of the treaty between the United States and Spain, etc."

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13, chapter 800, second session Fifty-sixth Congress, is hereby amended by striking out the words therein contained and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 13. That the Commission is hereby constituted a court of the United States; and an appeal to the Supreme Court shall be allowed on behalf of the United States from all judgments of the Commission adverse to the United States and on behalf of the plaintiff in any case where the matter in controversy exceeds $3,000. All such appeals shall be taken within ninety days after the judgment is entered or within ninety days after the passage of this act, and shall be allowed under such regulations as the Supreme Court may direct."

The following amendment, recommended by the Commission, was read:

Amend by striking out all of section 13 and inserting the following:

"SEC. 13. Said Commission being an inferior court of the United States, an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in matters of law shall be allowed on behalf of the United States from all final judgments or awards of the Commission adverse to the United States, and on behalf of the petitioner in any case where the amount in controversy exceeds $3,000. All such appeals shall be taken within ninety days after the final judgment or award is entered or within ninety days after the approval of the act, and shall be allowed and prosecuted under such rules and regulations as the Supreme Court of the United States may prescribe."

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Mr. RAY of New York. I now call up the bill H. R. 13679, being the bill to amend the bankruptcy law.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill (H. R. 13679) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898.

Mr. CLAYTON (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] that we dispense with the first reading of the bill. I should like to have some agreement——

Mr. RAY of New York. I quite agree with the gentleman in his suggestion, and therefore ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. This is practically the second reading of the bill. The regular order of proceeding in the House does not call for any subsequent reading.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to have an agreement with the gentleman about the time to be occupied in debate.

Mr. RAY of New York. The Judiciary Committee has other bills that we want to get through, and we shall have no other day at this session for the business of that committee; and to-day we shall have to suspend our proceedings at 5 o'clock. I suggest therefore that we have two hours' debate on this bill——

Mr. CLAYTON. Two hours of general debate?

Mr. RAY of New York. That the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] control one hour and that I control the other. My understanding is that the gentleman from Alabama desires to bring to a vote in this House a proposition to repeal the bankruptcy law. Now, instead of taking up time in moving the previous question and trying to cut off that proposition, I suggest it be agreed that that amendment be offered now and considered as pending, and that at the expiration of two hours we take a vote on that amendment, and then take a vote on this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. If I understand the gentleman, his proposition is to have two hours' general debate, he to control one hour and I the other, and that at the expiration of two hours I shall be permitted to offer——

Mr. RAY of New York. You might offer it now.

Mr. CLAYTON. That I be permitted to offer House bill 4579, to repeal the bankruptcy law, and that we have a vote on that proposition.

Mr. LANHAM. I hardly think it would be proper to accede to that suggestion, for the reason that the proposition stated by the gentleman from Alabama may be open to a point of order.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] that it will be difficult for us to reach an agreement unless on the line suggested by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is it proposed to shut off the right to offer amendments to the pending bill?

Mr. CLAYTON. That will be the effect if we adopt the substitute repealing the existing law.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. But suppose we do not adopt the substitute, will the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York cut off the right to offer amendments?

Mr. LANHAM. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from New York not to estop himself from the right to raise a point of order upon the proposition to repeal the existing law.

Mr. RAY of New York. That amendment can be offered and considered pending, but subject to the point of order.

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir; I did not understand the gentleman's proposed agreement to be that at all. The suggestion of the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, you do not desire to have anybody waive the point of order?

Mr. CLAYTON. I want the gentleman to agree that we shall have a vote upon this amendment. I do not think it subject to a point of order.

Mr. LANHAM. That is a matter to be yet determined.

Mr. CLAYTON. But at the same time I want to economize time. I do not care to go through the process of arguing a point of order upon that proposition. It is in the interest of economy of time that we should have a vote upon the proposition.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, then, suppose we make this arrangement—I ask gentlemen to listen carefully—that we debate this bill for two hours, the gentleman from Alabama to control one hour and I one hour; that at the expiration of two hours it shall be in order for the gentleman from Alabama to move his amendment; then let the point of order be passed upon, and then take a vote on the bill.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. When the gentleman speaks of taking a vote on the bill, does he mean that we are to take that vote without giving opportunity to offer amendments?

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman repeat his inquiry?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Do you mean to afford an opportunity——

Mr. RAY of New York. Later on——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. To offer amendments?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] does not mean to waive the reading of the bill?

Mr. CLAYTON. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from New York to be that we shall have two hours of general debate on the bill, he to control half the time and I the other half. I suggest to him that we make the time three hours—an hour and a half on each side. We shall have ample time.

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest to the gentleman that his proposition does not expedite matters. There is really no "general debate" in the House. The bill is in the House, and must be so considered. Debate on any amendment is in order, subject, however, to the previous question, which may be called at any time. If a majority of the House should support the call for the previous question, that, of course, will cut off all debate. An agreement to restrict "general debate" to two hours or three hours does not amount to anything, unless you cut off all debate.

It does not expedite business at all.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, yes; if my colleague will permit it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know in what situation the bill will be with reference to making amendments to the reported bill. For instance, I desire to offer an amendment which I have ready.

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman, as I understand it, after the bill has been read it is open to amendment with any point of it by any gentleman who gets the floor.

Mr. LANHAM. All amendments, however, subject to the point of order.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly, but it is open to the offering of amendments. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest a little further. I understand this is a short bill; and if the reading of the bill is dispensed with at this time, it means that the bill shall not be read at all in the House, and I hope that will not be insisted upon. I think the bill ought to be read.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill, I think; and if we have not the time to give it sufficient consideration to-day, we ought not to undertake it. I shall object to anything that will shut off the right to offer amendments to the House bill; and if the time is put in the control of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman on the other side [Mr. CLAYTON], there will be no opportunity.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it too late to make the point of order that this bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole? I undertook to get the floor when the reading of it was started, but I was unable to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that this bill is now being considered under an order of the House.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That clause 15 of section 1 of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"(15) A person shall be deemed insolvent within the provisions of this act whenever the aggregate of his property, exclusive of any property which he may have conveyed, transferred, concealed, or removed, or permitted to be concealed or removed, with intent to defraud, hinder, or delay his creditors, or which is exempt from being taken on execution under the laws of the United States or of the State or Territory in which the proceedings in bankruptcy were begun, shall not, at a fair valuation, be sufficient in amount to pay his debts."

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, at this point I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. If an amendment is to be offered to this provision, must it be offered now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the regular order is to read the bill through. After the bill has been read through, amendments may be offered to any part of it by any gentleman who gets the floor for that purpose. The Clerk will continue the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That clause 5 of section 2 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"(5) Authorize the business of bankrupts to be conducted for limited periods by receivers, the marshals, or trustees, if necessary in the best interests of the estates, and allow such officers additional compensation for such services;"

SEC. 3. That clause 4, subdivision a, of section 3 of said act, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"c Any natural person, except a wage-earner, or a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil, any unincorporated company, and any corporation engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, mining, or mercantile pursuits, owing debts to the amount of $1,000 or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this act. Private bankers, but not national banks or banks incorporated under State or Territorial laws, may be adjudged involuntary bankrupts."

"d The bankruptcy of a corporation shall not release its officers, directors, or stockholders, as such, from any liability under the laws of a State or Territory or of the United States."

SEC. 5. That subdivision b of section 14 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"b The judge shall hear the application for a discharge, and such proofs and pleas as may be made in opposition thereto by parties in interest, at such time as will give parties in interest a reasonable opportunity to be fully heard, and investigate the merits of the application and discharge the applicant unless he has (1) committed an offense punishable by imprisonment as herein provided; or (2) with intent to conceal his financial condition, destroyed, concealed, or failed to keep books of accounts or records from which such condition might be ascertained; or (3) obtained property on credit upon a materially false statement in writing made by him to any person for the purpose of obtaining credit, or of being communicated to the trade or to the person from whom he obtained such property on credit; or (4) made a fraudulent transfer of any portion of his property to any person; or (5) been granted or denied a discharge in bankruptcy within six years; or (6) in the course of his proceedings refused to obey any lawful order of or to answer any material question approved by the court."

SEC. 6. That section 17 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 9. That subdivision b of section 23 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"b Suits by the trustee shall only be brought or prosecuted in the courts where the bankrupt whose estate is being administered by such trustee might have brought or prosecuted them if proceedings in bankruptcy had not been instituted, unless by consent of the proposed defendant, except suits for the recovery of property under section 60, subdivision b, section 67, subdivision e, and section 70, subdivision e."

SEC. 11. That subdivision a of section 48 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

In the event of the confirmation of a composition after the qualification of a trustee, the court may allow such trustee not more than one-half commissions on the moneys or property received by him."

SEC. 12. That subdivision g of section 57 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"g The claims of creditors who have received preferences, voidable under section 60, subdivision b, or to whom conveyances, transfers, assignments, or incumbrances, void or voidable, under section 67, subdivision e, or section 70, subdivision e, have been made or given, shall not be allowed unless such creditors shall surrender such preferences, conveyances, transfers, assignments, or incumbrances."

SEC. 13. That subdivisions a and b of section 60 of said act be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"a A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent, he has, within four months before the filing of the petition, or after the filing of the petition and before the adjudication, procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself in favor of any person, or made a transfer of any of his property, and the effect of the enforcement of such judgment or transfer will be to enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class. Where the preference consists in a transfer, such period of four months shall not expire until four months after the date of the recording or registering of the transfer, if by law such recording or registering is required or permitted, or, if not, from the date when the beneficiary takes notorious, exclusive, or continuous possession of the property transferred.

"b If a bankrupt shall have given a preference, and the person receiving it, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property or its value from such person. And, for the purpose of such recovery, any court of bankruptcy, as hereinbefore defined, and any State court which would have had jurisdiction if bankruptcy had not intervened, shall have concurrent jurisdiction."

SEC. 14. That subdivision a and clause two of subdivision b of section 64 of said act be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"a The court shall order the trustee to pay all taxes legally due and owing by the bankrupt to the United States, State, county, district, or municipality, except such taxes as are a lien on a homestead claimed by or set off to him as exempt from being taken on execution, in advance of the payment of dividends to creditors, and upon filing the receipts of the proper public officers for such payment he shall be credited with the amount thereof, and in case any question arises as to the amount or legality of any such tax, the same shall be heard and determined by the court.

"(2) the filing fees paid by creditors in involuntary cases, and, where property of the bankrupt, transferred or concealed by him either before or after the filing of the petition, shall have been recovered by the efforts and at the expense of one or more creditors, the reasonable expenses of such creditors in so doing."

SEC. 15. That subdivision e of section 67 and subdivision e of section 70 of said act be, and the same are hereby, amended by adding at the end of each such subdivision the words:

"For the purpose of such recovery any court of bankruptcy as hereinbefore defined, and any State court which would have had jurisdiction if bankruptcy had not intervened, sl all have concurrent jurisdiction."

SEC. 16. That said act is also amended by adding thereto a new section, section 71, to read as follows:

"SEC. 71. That the clerks of the several district courts of the United States shall prepare and keep in their respect.ve offices complete and convenient indexes of all petitions and discharges in bankruptcy heretofore or hereafter filed in the said courts, and shall, when requested so to do, issue certificates of search certifying as to whether or not any such petitions or discharges have been filed; and said clerks shall be entitled to receive for such certificates the same fees as now allowed by law for certificates as to judgments in said courts: Provided, That said bankruptcy indexes and dockets, as well as the indexes of judgments in the several courts of the United States, shall at all times be open to inspection and examination by all persons or corporations for the purpose of transcription or otherwise without any fee or charge therefor."

Mr. RAY of New York and Mr. BARTLETT rose.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, in charge of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman will have an opportunity later.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman will be recognized at the proper time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry at this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to know when will be the proper time to offer an amendment to this bill under the rules. I understood the Chair, in answer to an inquiry from myself, to state that when the bill was read amendments were in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct. Whenever the gentleman gets the floor he can offer an amendment, but the Chair has recognized the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. LACEY rose.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call for order.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know whether by the permission of these amendments, or the waiving of the question as to these amendments, that will prevent the calling up of the committee amendments later on. There is one committee amendment that I am very much concerned in, and that is the proposition to repeal the bankruptcy law.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. LACEY. I have the right to make a parliamentary inquiry and have been recognized to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that there are no committee amendments.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; they are all committee amendments.

Mr. LACEY. There are a number of committee amendments, Mr. Speaker, and then there is an amendment proposed by the minority of the committee.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are no committee amendments, so far as the Chair knows, and the minority amendment will have to be offered in the individual capacity of an amendment. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that this is a legal proposition, a business proposition, and it is not one where those discussing it may indulge in flights of oratory or story telling, but where we must talk as business men on a business matter. I trust I may talk to the House in a business way, and have the attention of the members while I do this, because it is a subject in which the people, the business interests of this country, are interested, as they are interested in any other question affecting their business interests. The present bankruptcy law was approved and went into operation on the 1st day of July, 1898, and has been in operation since that time. The law provides in its terms that returns shall be made to the Attorney-General of the United States, and that he shall have a man in his office whose business it is to investigate the operations and workings of the bankruptcy law and to make his report.

In a few moments I will read from that report in order that you may know the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States and of the Department of Justice. During the last session of the last Congress I, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, over which I have the honor to preside in this Congress also, received from all over the country communications recommending certain changes in the bankruptcy law. For the reason that one of the important questions involved was before the Supreme Court of the United States for its adjudication, it was deemed wise to await the decision of that court before Congress should take any action in the matter.

However, in order that I might test the temper of the country, that I might know the opinion of the business interests of the country, I caused to be sent out about 20,000 inquiries to the leading lawyers, judges, and business houses all through the United States asking whether or not they desired to have the bankruptcy law retained or repealed; whether they deemed it best for the interests of the country to have a uniform bankruptcy law or to have none, and to leave these matters to the adjudication of the various States. I also asked these gentlemen to make inquiries of their business friends and to communicate their information, to state their approval or disapproval of a bill which I introduced in the House during that session and a copy of which was sent to them. I also asked them to give suggestions as to other amendments that might be deemed wise or advisable to make.

In reply I received over 16,000 answers from all over the United States—from the Pacific coast, from the South, from the West, from the East.

I have those replies. The letters speak for themselves. They are not printed circulars, but they are letters written by men of the classes I have named. Over 90 per cent insist upon the retention of the bankruptcy law upon the statute books. About 7 per cent favor a repeal, but all said that if not repealed they wanted the amendments proposed by the bill. About 3 per cent of those who did not favor the retention of the law absolutely said, "Amend the law and then retain it." So that less than 8 per cent of those who replied to this challenge sent out all over the United States favored a repeal of the law. The same answer comes from all sections of the country and from all business interests, I may say.

Now, what does the Attorney-General say in regard to this law? You will find his views on pages 389, 390, and 391 of his report for the year 1901. I quote from this report as follows:

[Excerpt from Exhibit U, Report on Bankruptcy Matters, by E. C. Brandenburg, in charge of bankruptcy matters, contained in report of the Attorney-General for 1901.]

NOVEMBER 15, 1901.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

SIR: The present law "establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," which was enacted July 1, 1898, has now been in force a little more than three years, this being longer than the operation of either the act of 1800 or 1841, and but eight years shorter than the act of 1867, which remained in force about eleven years notwithstanding its many inherent defects. The causes attending the repeal of the earlier laws are well known and need here no comment. The present law has materially profited by the experience gained under the earlier laws, and as a consequence contains the good features of all while avoiding many of their weak points. * * *

THE PRACTICAL OPERATION OF THE LAW.

The past year discloses the fact, as was anticipated in the earlier reports upon the practical operation of the bankruptcy law, that the number of voluntary petitions would shortly decrease in view of the belief that a good proportion of those filed during its earlier operation were those of old insolvents seeking to avail themselves of its advantages by securing a discharge coextensive with the limits of the United States. The present report shows that but 17,015 voluntary petitions were filed, which is more than 3,000 less than were filed during either of the two preceding year's operation of the law. It may be safely said that these reports are a fair criterion of business conditions, and the fact that more persons have not seen fit to take advantage of the law is clearly indicative of the continued business prosperity which has prevailed for the past few years. * * *

Several important opinions construing the law have been rendered during the past year by the Supreme Court of the United States. The most important and far-reaching is that of Carson, Pirie, Scott & Co. v. The Chicago Title and Trust Company. In this case the question involved was as to whether or not a creditor who had received a payment on account was obliged to surrender the same before proving his claim for the balance, and the Supreme Court by a vote of 5 to 4 held that this should be done. As this decision reaches the very foundation of our commercial credit system it has received considerable criticism pro and con, and various recommendations have been suggested with reference to amending the law in this respect. While the feeling is almost universal that this provision of the law should receive the attention of Congress, yet a difference of opinion exists, even among the commercial community, as to what the amendment should be.

A bill was introduced in Congress by Representative RAY suggesting various amendments of the law, all of which have received the most careful and detailed attention on the part of the merchants of the country as well as various legal associations, and on the whole, if enacted, would materially strengthen the weak points which the practical operation of the law has developed, with the result that the United States would have one of the most equitable bankruptcy laws, so far as all classes, debtor and creditor, are concerned, that exists in any country on the globe.

While it is, perhaps, not in the province of this Department to make recommendations, yet it is suggested that if Congress decides to undertake the extensive amendment of the law then the Ray bill would certainly remove most of the weak points which the practical operation of the law has developed.

If, however, Congress does not intend to make such extensive amendments, but prefers that they should be limited, then it seems to us that, as recommended in our previous reports, section 14, with reference to the question of discharges, should be amended by making it more difficult to secure a discharge on the part of a dishonest debtor. Secondly, that section 23, which was held by the Supreme Court in the case of Bardes v. Hawarden Bank to restrict the trustee in instituting suit for the recovering fraudulent transfers or preferences to the State court unless by consent of the defendant, be amended by giving the Federal court jurisdiction of such actions without the consent of the defendant. This will result in substituting the much more expeditious machinery of the Federal court, in which bankrupt matters are entitled to priority, for that of the State court, in which the action of the trustee is more or less dependent upon the grace of the court, it being recognized that Congress has no authority to impose any jurisdiction upon a State court, and that therefore it lies within the power of such courts to delay such proceedings or entertain or refuse jurisdiction, as they see fit. * * *

It might be suggested in this connection that the fees as now allowed by the law are reduced to a minimum, and that in order to maintain the high standard of the referees, many of whose abilities are unsurpassed and whose attainments might in another line demand a greater return, the fees should be revised so that they shall receive compensation commensurate with the amount of labor and skill required of them. Many of these referees are the peers of the judges of the Federal bench, and to secure a proper administration of the law such men should be retained in office. It would therefore seem wise that Congress should amend the law by fixing their fees at some reasonable amount, and thus avoid the serious conflict now arising whereby one judge construes the law liberally relating to the question of fees and allows a number of miscellaneous charges, realizing that the referee is underpaid and expecting through this means to some extent compensate him for his labors, while the judge in an adjoining district may be a strict constructionist and allow nothing except such as is specifically provided by the law. This results in great hardship, and Congress should make the fees uniform instead of leaving them to the discretion of the various courts.

That the bankruptcy law is meeting with approval on all hands is best attested by the fact that the American Bar Association in its recent convention in Denver, and the National Association of Credit Men at its convention at Buffalo, and other organizations have by resolution reiterated their belief in the advantages of the law and recommended that it be kept upon our statute books. There are, of course, isolated cases where exception is taken, but when sifted it usually develops that such opposition grows out of its operation in some way working injuriously to an individual, and not because the law is not advantageous to the community of the United States as a whole.

In other words, here is the deliberate statement and opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, after examining the law, after watching its operations and workings for nearly three years, and after studying this bill—here is his deliberate opinion that with these amendments we shall have the most just and equitable bankruptcy law of any nation on the face of the earth.

Now, I wish to say in that connection that there is no civilized nation on the face of the earth, doing great business and having great commercial interests, that does not have a bankruptcy law on its statute books. And with the growth and development of this great nation, with our close connections by telegraph, telephone, and railroad, Chicago is the immediate neighbor of New York City; Boston and San Francisco sit side by side in the commercial world. A few moments, and they confer with each other; and it is therefore of importance to manufacturing, mercantile, and business interests of every character that we have some uniformity of law in this regard.

When the bankruptcy bill was introduced by the gentleman now Speaker of the House I was at his right hand, and we considered it in the Fifty-fifth Congress and brought it in here and asked its enactment. Some of the great rich business firms of the country opposed it. They said they were able to take care of themselves; that they could and did employ lawyers in all the States, in all the great cities, and that they could take care of themselves; that they understood the divers laws of the various States; but to-day nearly all of those large firms advocate these amendments and the retention of the law upon the statute books. That demand is here in the shape of thousands of telegrams and letters.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House for a few moments briefly to what this bill does. It has been reported to the House now for some months. I have sent out thousands and thousands of copies of the bill—at one time over 10,000 copies—and I asked criticism; I asked suggestions of lawyers, merchants, mercantile firms, business men, North, East, South, and West, and no substantial amendment to the bill has been suggested from any source.

Now, I claim no credit for this bill. It is the work of the best judges, the best lawyers, the best practical business men in the United States from all sections of the United States. Before I introduced it, it was submitted in all quarters, to bar associations, to mercantile associations, manufacturing associations; and laboring men associations were called together and considered the bill, and their amendments and suggestions were agreed to; and it was only when the bill had been made satisfactory to all, when they all agreed to it and said that it was just, equitable, and proper, then only was it introduced by me in the shape in which it is now presented to the country. Now, what does this bill do?

Mr. Speaker, permit me to ask the Chair at the expiration of half an hour to call my attention to the time, so that I may yield the floor.

The first amendment will make the law more uniform and equitable by providing that where insolvency is the question at issue assets claimed to be exempt shall not be counted in ascertaining the aggregate of the debtor's property.

The second amendment simply authorizes what is now done by the courts; that is, it authorizes the court to allow additional compensation when the business of a bankrupt is conducted for a limited period by the receiver, marshal, or trustee in the interest of the creditors.

The next amendment makes the equivalent acts of a general assignment by an insolvent person, a voluntary accounting of an insolvent partnership by action brought by one of the partners, and an application for a receivership of an insolvent corporation each acts of bankruptcy. This makes the law more uniform and will reduce many of the inequities now practiced on creditors.

The next amendment simply provides that those corporations which can now be adjudged involuntary bankrupts may become voluntary bankrupts on the petition of an officer or stockholder duly authorized at a meeting called for that purpose by a vote of the majority in amount of the total stock of the corporation, and adds mining corporations to those now covered by the law.

As a safeguard and to prevent injustice it is provided by a further amendment that the bankruptcy of a corporation shall not release its officers, directors, or stockholders as such from any liability under the laws of a State or Territory or of the United States. That is, if these officers or any of them by wrongdoing or violating the law of the State have incurred any liability they are not to be discharged from such obligations or liabilities.

The next amendment, section 5 of the bill, makes definite and certain the purpose of the law as it was framed, to wit: That the words "in contemplation of bankruptcy" mean a present or future state of insolvency and purpose to take advantage of the law. The amendment is necessary because the courts have held that the words "in contemplation of bankruptcy" mean with a view to the actual filing of a petition, and therefore many men have been discharged who ought not to have been, because it was impossible to prove that they committed the fraudulent acts mentioned at a time when they had in mind the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, although they did have in mind a present or future state of insolvency and committed the acts for the purpose of defrauding their creditors.

This amendment also provides four additional grounds for refusing a discharge in bankruptcy: (1) Obtaining property on credit on materially false statements; (2) making a fraudulent transfer of property; (3) having been granted or denied a discharge in bankruptcy within six years, and (4) having refused to obey the lawful orders of the court or having refused to answer material questions approved by the court. No person who has been guilty of any of these fraudulent acts should be discharged, and a person who has refused to obey the order of the court ought not to be discharged, and it is quite clear that no person should have the benefit of the act as a voluntary bankrupt oftener than once in six years. Some men in some of the large cities have made bankruptcy a profession, and it is proposed by the amendment to stamp out these practices.

Now, as to the amendment that the courts may allow certain officers when they take the property of an estate into their custody additional compensation for that extra work. Under the law as it stands now the court frequently puts a bankrupt's property in the hands of a receiver. In order to have it taken care of, it requires a large expense to the estate, whereas if we have this provision of the law, it will lessen the expense of the Administration of the bankrupt law.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the return of no property found be conclusive of the insolvency under the amendment?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, we do not change the law in that regard at all.

The next amendment provides that liabilities for frauds, etc., as described in the act shall not be released by the discharge. As the law now is these liabilities must have been reduced to judgment or else the bankrupt is discharged. This amendment is in the interest of justice and honest dealing and honest conduct. This amendment further provides that a discharge in bankruptcy shall not release the bankrupt from liability for alimony due or to become due the wife, or for maintenance or support of wife or child, or for seduction of an unmarried female, or for criminal conversation. It seems to the committee, and this is the universal sentiment, that the bankrupt ought not to be discharged from liabilities of this description.

The next amendment shortens the time for joining issue in involuntary cases. The expeditious disposition of an estate in bankruptcy is what all creditors desire, and this amendment is in the interest of all parties and simply prevents undue delay.

The next amendment permits the wife to be examined as a witness as to business transactions to which she is or has been a party. In some of the States the wife may now be examined the same as any other witness. In other States she can not be, and this amendment, carefully guarded by a proviso, simply allows her examination as to business transactions to which she has been a party. To this there can be no reasonable objection.

The next amendment is in the interest of the speedy settlement of bankrupt estates. It has been held that actions to recover property belonging to the estate and fraudently withheld or disposed of must be brought in the local courts. In great cities this works a practical denial of justice, as the calendars of the State courts are many times years behind, and it is conceded that in the city of New York a case can not be reached for trial in less than from two to three years after the action is brought, unless for some reason it is preferred.

The next amendment gives a larger fee to the clerk. It is conceded on all hands that the present fee is so small that the clerk can not afford to do the work required of him. The increase given by this amendment is very small, indeed, and can not be reasonably objected to.

The same remarks apply to the next amendment.

The next amendment, section 12 of the bill, is the most important of all. Under the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in Pirie v. Chicago Title and Trust Company (182 U. S., 438), that section 60, subdivision a, is a definition of a preference, it followed that payments made in good faith and other bona fide transactions after actual insolvency, though in due course of trade and business and without knowledge or reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended, must be, under section 57 g, surrendered before a creditor who received such a payment could prove the balance of his debt. This was never intended by the framers of the law, and it works obvious injustice and is the source of 99 per cent of the objections to the law. The amendments proposed by section 12 of the bill and the other sections remedy all this.

The next amendment puts the four months' clause in subdivision a instead of subdivision b, and where it ought to be. As the law now stands, a preferential mortgage may be given and the creditor preferred, by withholding it from record four months, be able to dismiss the trustees' suit to recover the same, although it was recorded within the four months' period.

The next amendment simply provides that the trustee shall not be compelled to pay the accrued taxes on the homestead set-off to the bankrupt from the balance of the estate.

The further amendment to section 64 of the act simply provides that the creditor may be allowed the reasonable expense of reclaiming property illegally transferred or concealed.

The next amendment is in line with the others, providing concurrent jurisdiction in the State and United States courts, and is in the interest of a speedy settlement of estates.

The last amendment is one generally demanded, and is in the interest of all persons who deal with property. It requires the clerks to prepare and keep indexes of all petitions and discharges in bankruptcy and to issue certificates in relation thereto when required. It also requires that these be kept open to inspection and examination. It is frequently desirable to know whether a person has filed a petition in bankruptcy, and also whether he has been discharged, and it is many times impossible within a reasonable time to ascertain these facts in the absence of convenient indexes.

Annexed hereto is a more complete analysis of these proposed amendments, useful and convenient to the lawyer, and in same attention is called to the decisions of the courts relating to the amended sections.

In proper cases and under proper restrictions those who have been unfortunate in business should be released from their debts on surrendering all their property to their creditors. But the law should be so framed as to prevent injustice and improper and indiscriminate discharges, and should also prevent its being availed of by the professional bankrupt or the dishonest debtor.

The involuntary features are most commendable, for through their instrumentalities fraudulent and unjust preferences are prohibited and there is greater confidence in the business world. Much of the faultfinding with the bankruptcy law has come from those who, having claims against some insolvent person, have been unable to collect for years (and these persons knew that they could not collect), but they have seen the debtor discharged under the bankruptcy law and have seen him reenter the business world, and by the exercise of his talent and industry become a valuable factor in the business world. These debtors could never have thus reentered business had it not been for the bankruptcy law, and this fact the creditor overlooks. He seems to think that but for the bankruptcy law he would have been paid under this improved condition of the debtor.

That dishonest men do avail themselves of the law and by fraud and perjury secure discharges can not be denied, but these instances are very rare, and when we contrast the great army of honest and industrious men who have been put upon their feet through the instrumentalities of the bankruptcy law with the very few dishonest persons who have been discharged under it, we must all concede that the law is wise and productive of great good and ought to be retained, and amended when experience shows that amendments are necessary in the interest of the business world.

Then we have found by experience another thing which I desire to call more particular attention to, because it is important, gentlemen, and that is that we have in some of the great cities and business centers of the United States men who make it a business to run in debt and then take advantage of the bankruptcy act. In some cases within two years a man has taken advantage of the law twice, and in another locality, I think, in less than three years a man had taken advantage of it twice and was seeking an opportunity to take advantage of it a third time. Therefore it is that we amend the law and provide that no man shall take the benefit of this law oftener than once in six years, and that will cut off that class of men that we may characterize as professional bankrupts.

Then again, we found that in the construction of the law that has been put upon it the grounds provided for refusing a discharge from bankruptcy are not ample, and therefore we have added several, and you will find in the bill a provision in section 5 amending section 14, giving additional causes for refusing a discharge in bankruptcy.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We have State laws providing for the administration of insolvent State banks. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this would make any change in reference to that matter?

Mr. RAY of New York. It might in certain cases, but not necessarily so.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Would they be under the control of the Federal authority?

Mr. RAY of New York. They might, but not necessarily so. Now, again, Mr. Speaker, coming to subdivision a and b, division 18, that merely expedites the closing up of an estate. That is all it does. We go along further—and I will not take the time to deal at length with all the little verbal changes which have no particular effect on the law; they are simple and easily understood. One other provision: In the great cities like New York and Chicago, if you can find and seek to recover property which has been transferred in fraud of the bankrupt act in the State court, we find the settlement of the estate, in some cases, may be postponed three or four years because of delays in the State courts by reason of the immense business done in these courts. Therefore, in the interest of both the debtor and the creditor class, in the interest of speedy disposition of these questions—matters that arise in bankruptcy—we give the United States courts concurrent jurisdiction in these cases. This is recommended by all the lawyers, all the judges, all the business men everywhere. It can do no harm, and it can meet with no objection from any gentleman unless he is absolutely opposed to the Federal court having jurisdiction in any case whatever.

Now I come to the most important amendment of all included in this bill.

Mr. GILBERT. If the gentleman will pardon me, I understood him to say that this included unincorporated companies. If a company has no existence, no entity, will the discharge in bankruptcy operate to relieve the members of the company in those cases where they have no charter, for instance?

Mr. RAY of New York. It would release them from their debts and liabilities, except any liability they had incurred in an official capacity in having represented the company as an officer.

Now, one of the most important amendments, and it is perhaps the most important amendment, and is necessary under this condition of facts. Under the law as it now stands, and under the interpretation put upon it by the Supreme Court, it was held that if A is doing business with B, if A gives credit to B to an extent of $20,000, for instance, and B has paid nothing on account, but has made his purchases at different times of different items from time to time, the debt is all due and past due although the items of credit were given at different times. Now, A says to B: "Before I give you any further credit you must pay on account." So B pays to A $15,000 of the $20,000 on account. It is paid in good faith, it is received in good faith, it is applied in good faith. It was paid on a debt past due, with all the items past due.

Now, gentlemen, ought not that to be retained? Is not that an honest payment whenever made, paid and received in good faith? But the court held, giving construction to the act as it stands, that if A on the faith of that payment should give credit for $10,000 more the same day, so that B then owed $15,000 instead of $20,000, then if B should happen through some unforseen circumstances to go into bankruptcy within the next four months, that before A can prove up his debt for $15,000 he must return the $15,000 paid to him and received by him in good faith. Now, have I made that plain to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think you have to me.

Mr. RAY of New York. I tried to make it plain so that all business men can understand it; we have so framed this bill that lawyers, judges, and men everywhere say we have corrected the evil. Justice will be done.

So that if A is giving credit to B and the debt is due or past due, and B pays money on account of that debt in good faith and that money is received in good faith—if there is no dishonesty in the transaction—then the creditor may go on in case of bankruptcy and prove up the balance of his debt. And that is as it ought to be.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is perfectly clear to me. But the question which I wanted to put to the gentleman was in regard to the bankruptcy of a partnership. Suppose that the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] form a partnership under the name of RAY & CRUMPACKER. Suppose that the gentleman from New York is worth $100,000 in his own right and the gentleman from Indiana is worth a similar sum in his own right. But suppose the partnership assets amount to only $20,000. Now, can the members of that firm come in and get a discharge in bankruptcy as a partnership without affecting the individual interests of either?

Mr. RAY of New York. No; we could not do that unless the partnership were a limited one. We do not propose to permit an association debt to be discharged in that way. We do not propose to allow a discharge until the property of the individual members of the firm has been exhausted, unless it be a case where, under the laws of the State, the partnership liability has been limited. We do not undertake to interfere with the laws of any State in that regard.

Now, Mr. Speaker, will you kindly inform me how much time I have occupied?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has occupied twenty-six minutes.

Mr. LESSLER. I should like to ask the gentleman this question: In his report it is stated:

> It is not thought expedient at this time to attempt to frame a clause specifying what transactions are protected.

Would it not be wise to insert something of that kind in this bill?

Mr. RAY of New York. We have done so fully, and the judges and lawyers of the country say that the matter is fully covered; that every business interest is protected.

Mr. LESSLER. Would it not be better covered if you would put in a proviso that bona fide transactions are protected?

Mr. RAY of New York. That is covered now in express words. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS] conferred with leading lawyers and judges of his section. I conferred with leading lawyers and judges of New York. Gentlemen from Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, New Orleans, Charleston, S. C.; Richmond, Va., and all through the North and South say that the section as now amended will do just exactly what we claim it will do, and they approve the bill.

Now, I add a careful analysis of the bill:

ANALYSIS OF BILL TO AMEND BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Section 1: Amends clause (15) of section 1 of the law so that where insolvency is the question at issue assets claimed to be exempt shall not be counted in ascertaining the "aggregate of his (the debtor's) property," thus doing away with an injustice growing out of the new definition of insolvency in States that allow large exemptions. (See In re Baumann (Tenn.), 96 Fed., 946.)

Section 2: Designed to permit the allowance of extra compensation to trustees when they do more than merely collect and distribute (as, for instance, when they are ordered to continue a going business for a considerable period of time), their fees being now limited by section 48 to commissions on dividends to unsecured creditors. (See In re Epstein (Ark.), 109 Fed., 879, and the cases cited.)

Section 3: Intended to bring about the result that the equivalent acts of (1) a general assignment by an insolvent person, (2) a voluntary accounting of an insolvent partnership by action brought by one of the partners, and (3) an application for a receivership of an insolvent corporation shall each be acts of bankruptcy, instead of the first (1) only, as now. Besides making the law more uniform, this change will reduce to a minimum present notorious inequities practiced on creditors through in-the-family accountings and directorial receiverships under State laws. (See In re Empire Metallic Bedstead Company (New York), 95 Fed., 957; Id., on appeal, 981, and subsequent cases uniformly holding the same doctrine.)

Section 4: Amend section 4 of the law by (1) providing that those corporations which can now be adjudged involuntary bankrupts may, on a vote of stockholders representing a majority of the stock, petition for voluntary bankruptcy, (2) adding mining corporations to those that are affected by the law, and (3) affirmatively declaring that the bankruptcy of a corporation shall not release its officers, as such, from any liability created by law.

The first (1) restores that portion of the first paragraph of section 37 of the bankruptcy law of 1867 which permitted business corporations to file voluntary petitions, with, however, some additional restrictions for the protection of stockholders—a change the necessity of which is emphasized by the prevailing tendency in important commercial States to supersede partnerships completely by small corporations.

The second (2) is made necessary by the uniform holdings of the courts that mining corporations, which are of primary importance in some parts of the country, are not among those now enumerated in section 4 b. (See In re Chicago-Joplin Lead and Zinc Co. (Mo.), 104 Fed., 67; McNamara v. Helena Coal Co. (Ala.), 5 Am. B. R., 48; In re Keystone Coal Co. (Pa.), 6 Am. B. R., 377.)

The third (3) is merely precautionary—that there may be no doubt about the effect of the discharge of a corporation. (See In re Marshall Paper Co., 102 Fed., 872.)

Section 5: Modifies one of the present objections to a discharge and adds four new objections.

It has been uniformly held under the present law that "in contemplation of bankruptcy" (sec. 14 b, 2) means with a view to the actual filing of a petition, and not merely a present or future state of insolvency. (In re Holman (Iowa), 92 Fed., 512; In re Carmichael (Iowa), 96 Fed., 594; In re Morgan (Ark.), 101 Fed., 932.) This has made this objection to a discharge practically valueless. The amendment drops this element of proof out, as well as two or three other words, which are either tautological or unnecessary.

The very general complaint that the present law lets too many rogues escape from their debts—that it is weak in its discharge features—is met by four additional objections, carefully selected from a multitude of suggestions made.

The first (3) is almost identical with that proposed by S. 1035, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session (section 51 b (3), the Lindsay bill), and adopted by the House substitute. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-fifth Congress, vol. 31, p. 2099, sec. 13 b, 3.)

The second (4) is a rephrasing of an objection to discharge found in section 29 of the law of 1867, and "transfer," now including "conveyance," "mortgage," "payment," etc., means the same thing. In effect it is the same as section 51 b (4) of the Lindsay bill and as section 13 b (4) of the House substitute, above.

The third (5) will put an end to the possibility of debtors going through bankruptcy every month. The new period, six years, is an average arrived at from the suggestions received. (Compare Report of National Asssociation of Referees in Bankruptcy, published in March, 1900, for other ways of solving this problem.)

The fourth (6) is intended to meet a defect which grows out of decisions that, following Counselman v. Hitchcock (142 U. S., 547), declare that the protection afforded a bankrupt by the last clause of section 7 a (9) does not amount to the immunity guaranteed by the fifth amendment to the Constitution. (See In re Rosser (Mo.), 96 Fed., 305, and compare In re Marx (Ky.), 102 Fed., 676.) The suggestion that the immunity clause inserted in the interstate-commerce law and held constitutional in Brown v. Walker (161 U. S., 591) be also inserted here is met by the objection that such clause would in effect grant pardon in advance to bankrupts called to testify, and might result in a general amnesty to all bankrupts amenable to punishment under section 29. A discharge is a boon, not a right. He who asks it should tell what he knows of his assets and his past dealings. If he does not, the discharge should be denied him. It is thought that this new objection to discharge will accomplish much that would be accomplished by the clause in the interstate-commerce law, without amounting to freedom from criminal prosecution, too.

Section 6: The changes in section 17 of the law are to settle questions arising from antagonistic decisions of the court and to exclude beyond peradventure certain liabilities growing out of offenses against good morals from the effect of a discharge. (Compare a similar amendment to the English act of 1883 by section 10 of the amendatory act of 1890.)

The substitution of "liabilities" for "judgments in actions" makes the clause broader. Now claims created by fraud but not reduced to judgment are discharged. Neither the claim nor the judgment should be. (Compare In re Rhutassel (Iowa), 96 Fed., 567, with In re Lewenson (N. Y.), 99 Fed., 73.)

The reasons for the other changes are too patent to require statement. (As to the dischargeability of alimony, compare In re Houston (Ky.), 94 Fed., 119, with In re Nowell (Mass.), 99 Fed., 931; of judgments for seduction, In re Sullivan (N. Y.), 2 Am. B. R., 30, with In re Freche (N. J.), 109 Fed., 620; of judgments for criminal conversation, In re Tinker (N. Y.), 99 Fed., 79, with Colwell v. Tinker (N. Y.), 6 Am. B. R., 434.)

Section 7: It is conceded that too much time was given by the law for the joining of issue in involuntary cases, and that the law was silent as to the method and time of service where the bankrupt had absconded. As changed, section 18 provides for a short service by publication, and not only shortens the time within which a debtor personally served must appear and plead, but provides that time to plead shall expire when time to appear does, and not ten days later, as now. All this is in the interest of the rapid administration of asset cases and the consequent reduction of expenses.

Section 8: Intended to make a wife, who is often the depositary of property belonging really to the bankrupt, a compellable witness in every State as to certain transactions to which she is or has been a party. Without her evidence it is sometimes practically impossible to trace property. Neither principle nor policy entitles her to her privilege when the transaction under investigation is a business one between her and her husband. For evils growing out of section 21a, as now phrased, see In re Jefferson (Wash.), 96 Fed., 826; In re Fowler (Wis.), 93 Fed., 417.

Section 9: Under the law of 1867, the Federal and State courts had concurrent jurisdiction of suits to recover property fraudulently or preferentially transferred. Bardes v. Bank of Hawarden (Iowa), 178 U. S., 524, has so construed section 23b of the law as to deny such jurisdiction to the district courts, save with the consent of the proposed defendant. In commercial centers this amounts to a denial of justice, the calendars of the State courts being years behindhand; while, growing out of Bardes v. Bank, have come decisions which have crippled the administration of the law to a marked degree. (See In re Ward (Mass.), 5 Am. B. R., 215; Mueller v. Nugent (Ky.), 105 Fed., 581; this latter, however, recently reversed by the Supreme Court.) There is a very general demand for a return to the policy of the law of 1867. Were it not for section 23b, section 2 (7) would probably confer ample jurisdiction on the district courts. The change in section 23b proposed by the bill simply excepts from the operation of it all suits which can, under the specific words of the law, be brought to recover property, and this merely by referring to the three sections under which alone such suits can be brought. To remove all doubt, also, sections 13 and 16 of the bill confer concurrent jurisdiction of all such suits on the State courts and the Federal district courts, by adding appropriate words to each of the three sections—section 60b, section 67e, and section 70e.

Sections 10 and 11: These changes in section 40 and section 48 are in response to the very general opinion that the referees and trustees are not now adequately paid. The filing fee of each officer is doubled, making the deposit required at the inception of bankruptcy proceedings $40 instead of $25. It is thought this will prove sufficient in all no-asset cases. Since, under the law, it has been quite uniformly held that the commissions of these officers must be computed on moneys paid out by way of dividends only, this species of compensation has in the large majority of cases amounted to little. The change suggested rests on the analogy of the State laws, which reckon the commissions of executors, receivers, etc., on moneys received and paid out, and is fairer. The other changes are in the line of increasing efficiency and the securing of the best talent for the important work committed to these officers. Thus, the large commissions to trustees in small cases, that they may have greater incentive to search for and recover property, and the 50-cent filing fee for referees, as probably the fairest way properly to compensate them for the great amount of extra work in hearing contests on claims, etc.

The collection of this filing fee in advance seems to be permitted by the rules in many districts, though without apparent sanction of law. The suggested amendment ratifies this practice, which has not proven burdensome, while removing the chief objection to it—the requirement that the fee be paid as a condition of filing a claim at all—by requiring that such fee be paid as a cost of administration. The trustee is also given the same commission in composition cases as is the referee. This was an oversight when the law was framed.

Section 12: Pirie v. Chicago Title and Trust Company (182 U. S., 438), having held that section 60a is a definition of "preference," it necessarily followed that payments and other bona fide transactions after actual insolvency, though in due course of trade and without knowledge or reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended, must be, under Section 57g, surrendered before a creditor who received such a payment could prove the balance of his debt. This was not what was intended by the framers of the law. There is a very urgent and widespread demand for such an amendment as will obviate this menace to trade.

The Ray bill (H. R. 4310) attempts to do this, but leaves a loophole in that only voidable preferences, as defined in section 60 a and b, must be surrendered, whereas some fraudulent transfers (section 67e and section 70e) might be retained and the debt still proven. This clause, section 57g, has therefore been modified by adding words referring specifically to creditors who have received an advantage, void or voidable, under section 67c or section 70e. There are no other sections in the law which provide for suits to recover back from creditors or other persons property (which includes money) improperly transferred. The change results, therefore, in that only those payments or transfers which could be recovered back by suit must be surrendered under section 57g. This change will also settle the animated and unfortunate controversy over the meaning and effect of section 60c; compare In re Keller (Ia.), 109 Fed., 118, where a district court refuses to follow a court of appeals, in McKey v. Lee (Ia.), 105 Fed., 923; also In re Dickson (Mass.), 111 Fed., 726, wherein a circuit court of appeals apparently refuses to follow the Supreme Court in Pirie v. Chicago Title and Trust Co., above.

It is not thought expedient at this time to attempt to frame a clause specifying what transactions are protected (compare section 49 of the English act of 1883 for such a clause) or to change the so-called definition of insolvency. The simpler the changes in the present law the fewer will be the controversies in the courts; and especially in a question which, like this, is at the root of our credit system, the less the disturbance of business.

Section 13: Section 60 a and b is amended in three ways:

First, by replacing the four months' clause in a, where it was in the Lindsay bill, instead of in b, as now, and where a casual reading of the law indicates it should have been left. (See In re Jones (Mass.), 4 Am. B. R., 563, for the far-reaching result of this transposition.)

Second, by adding to a a clause which shall be equivalent to that found in section 3 b (1). It seems that as section 60 a now stands, a preferential mortgage may be given, and the creditor preferred, by withholding it from record four months, be able to dismiss the trustee's suit to recover the same, though the paper was actually recorded within the four months' period. (See In re Wright (Ga.), 96 Fed., 187; In re Mersman (N. Y.), 7 Am. B. R., 46.)

Third, by adding the clause as to jurisdiction of suits previously explained under section 9.

Section 14: Where homestead exemptions are allowed, it has been held that a bankrupt may insist on the trustee paying the accrued taxes on the homestead set off to him. (See In re Tilden (Ia.), 91 Fed., 500; contra, In re Veitsch (Conn.), 101 Fed., 251.) This is an injustice to creditors which calls for amendment. That suggested will accomplish the desired result.

It frequently happens that the action of individual creditors in suing, as, for instance, by creditor's bill before the bankruptcy, inures to the benefit of the trustee; and almost as frequently that, through the efforts of certain creditors, property is recovered after the bankruptcy begins. It is only fair that their disbursements, by which all creditors have profited, should be accounted for to them. The change in section 64b (2) would accomplish this.

Section 15 adds the clause on jurisdiction of suits to sections 67a and 70e, previously explained under section 9.

Section 16 provides for indexes, etc.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the floor to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Before the gentleman from New York takes his seat, I should like to ask him what construction the committee has given to the familiar words "in contemplation of bankruptcy?"

Mr. RAY of New York. Let the gentleman read my report, and he will see what the courts have stated about that and what we undertake to say here.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I understand what the courts have said. The courts have always contended that the phrase referred to a petition in bankruptcy.

Mr. RAY of New York. I again ask the gentleman to read my report. I must not take any further time now. I have commented on that matter in my report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am simply asking for information.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, is it any worse for you to read the report than for me to stand here under pressure and state what it contains?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Probably I should understand the matter better from your explanation than by reading the report.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, I will come around and explain it to the gentleman from Alabama while other gentlemen are speaking. I want to be polite, but I must decline to yield further.

Mr. Speaker, I now reserve the balance of my time, and yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. I understand that I am to have an hour in my own right.

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly; I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not want to take any of the gentleman's time, but desire to occupy my own.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is right.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the following amendment which I shall offer:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"That the act approved July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing herein shall in any way affect proceedings under said act begun prior to the taking effect of this act, and this act shall take effect ninety days after the approval thereof."

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I endeavored to listen to the gentleman from New York as best I could and to hear some good reason for the retention of the present bankruptcy law. I was unable, however, to gather from his statement or argument any reason for the retention of that law except as he contended that it is a popular measure.

That proposition, Mr. Speaker, is open to very serious doubt. It is true that the gentleman sent his circular letters broadcast through the country for the purpose of getting replies from people who favored the retention of this law, and he received to some extent what he sought to get when he started out. Greenleaf in his work on evidence comments on that sort of testimony. He remarks in substance, if I recollect aright, that when a man starts out with the avowed purpose of proving a given thing, he will generally by hook or crook get what he seeks, and come back and say, "I have proved it; I have the evidence."

That sort of testimony is worth very little. Mr. Speaker, against those letters that he has gathered I interpose the history of the bankruptcy legislation in this country, the short life of the first bankruptcy law of two years, the short life of the next one, I believe of three years, the short life of the bankruptcy law of 1867 of eleven years, following disasters of the great civil war.

The present bankruptcy law has been in operation about three years, so that while this country has existed under a constitutional government for about one hundred and fourteen years, only about twenty years of that time have we had a bankruptcy law in operation. The people have never favored a permanent bankruptcy system. They do not to-day favor one. I dare say that nearly every letter which the gentleman received had some criticisms or objections to this law.

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that hardly any given number of business men can agree altogether on the defects of the existing bankruptcy law. It is begging the question to say that there is a popular demand for the retention of this law. How have the people been canvassed? Do people whom the gentleman wrote to represent the 80,000,000 of American people? We do not know whether they are even a fair sample

Mr. Speaker, we can judge of the unpopularity of this bankruptcy system by citing the fact that in this Congress some six or seven bills have been introduced for its repeal, by citing the fact that nearly every letter that a member of Congress has had from his constituents has said either that this law ought to be amended in certain respects or that it ought to be repealed. Many have said that it ought to be repealed entirely. This bill brought here by this committee is a confession of the inadequacy and the unpopularity of the present bankruptcy law.

The Judiciary Committee has had this subject under consideration for months, and what has been the result of their labors? The net result has been to make the bankruptcy law, so far as unfortunate debtors are concerned, more rigid and more stringent and to increase the fees of Federal officials. The proposition is embodied in this bill to enlarge the fees of referees, receivers, clerks, marshals, and others. The bill will show what fees are enlarged and what commissions increased.

Mr. BARTLETT. Clerks and referees.

Mr. CLAYTON. And the clerks and others. This committee's work has been formulated into this bill which seeks to make the present law more oppressive against the unfortunate debtor, seeks to make it more a collection agency, seeks to make it more an engine of tyranny against the man who is laboring under a load of debt, and then the next shining virtue written on almost every page of the bill is an increase of the fees of these Federal officeholders.

Now, if I had the time to take up the bill section by section I could point out the harsh features of it and demonstrate how the features increasing the pay for the purpose of adding to the fees of these Federal officials are everywhere apparent in the bill. From this bill the minority dissent. The minority dissent because they say that if there was ever a demand for this bankruptcy law that that demand has been met, that if there was any necessity for it the time for it has passed, and this bill which seeks to amend it is for the avowed purpose of closing the avenues more and more to unfortunate debtors.

The gentlemen who advocate this bill say that it is for the purpose of preventing fraud and dishonesty on the part of debtors.

Our reply to that is that if you seek to prevent fraud and dishonesty under the bankruptcy law on the part of unfortunate debtors the best way to do is to repeal the original law, which is essentially bad, and then you will stop all the frauds and dishonesty which have grown up under the law.

Mr. Speaker, I have offered the amendment which has been read by the Clerk, and at the proper time I shall ask its consideration. It seeks to repeal the whole law. If that amendment shall be adopted, repealing the law, then a further examination of the details of this bill will be unnecessary, but if it shall not prevail, then during the progress of this debate the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and myself and others will undertake to discuss the details of this bill and demonstrate why it should not be supported.

I call the attention of the House to the expensiveness of the present bankruptcy law, and I invite the attention of the gentleman from New York to this. You will notice from this bill that the fees of referees and others are doubled, and in some cases the allowances are more than doubled. They are increased in some cases from $5 to $10 and in other cases from $10 to $20, and so on; and in passing I might remark that it was the looting of insolvent estates by Federal officials under the act of 1867 that made that law odious, and that finally led to its repeal.

I hazard the prediction here now that if this act is not repealed the fees of these officials will be increased from time to time until this bankruptcy law will become a scandal and a disgrace to the statute books of our country. Now, what is the necessity for this bankruptcy law? I ask my good friend, the next governor of Texas [Mr. LANHAM], to answer this.

I ask him to stand up and indict the people of his State, to stand up and indict the people of Alabama, to stand up and indict the people of New York and say that a State government and the people of a State are not just as honest, just as capable of administering the estates of insolvent people as Federal officials are.

It is contended that because the Federal Constitution permits a uniform bankruptcy system we must, under that authority, depart from the ideas that the fathers had when they framed that Constitution. They had in contemplation the condition of unfortunate people who had come from the Old World to this country debt ridden, and who had been put into prison and had suffered such hardships as only a Dickens could describe in his fascinating writings. They had in mind the case of Georgia, now a great State, where the grant to Oglethorpe permitted him to take a colony of debt-ridden people and free them from debt and let them start anew in life.

But this is a new idea which has been grafted upon this constitutional provision—the idea that the unfortunate debtor is of secondary consideration; that he amounts to little or nothing, except as a victim, or, at least, that he plays the second fiddle in the bankruptcy court; that the great creditor, or, in the language of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], the business people, are of the first and paramount importance.

We have heard that sort of talk all over this country, and gentlemen conjure with the name of the business man when they want to throw sand in your eyes and deceive you as to a proposition. Those on the debtor side of this question are business men, too. They have some right to be heard and are entitled to some consideration in our legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, will any man here, will any Democrat here, say that his State can not administer justice, can not prevent dishonesty, can not make men do right, can not distribute assets as well as the Federal courts can?

If so, let him stand up and confess that the Democratic doctrine of faith in the State, of leaving it in the full exercise of all its reserved powers, in the full control of regulating the domestic relations, of punishing fraud, of punishing larceny, of punishing all sorts of crime, let him confess that his whole doctrine of State rights is an error and that State government is a failure and turn to the Federal Government and to the Federal courts to help the States where they are unable to execute and perform their duty of the greater part of the governing business of the people.

Let the advocates of this bill go further and stand on this floor and advocate an anti-polygamy law. Let him go just a step further and advocate a Federal law fixing uniform hours of labor in the private manufactories of the people in the States, State regulations to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Speaker, the only difference between this case and the case of the antipolygamy proposition and the uniform Federal labor law for the States is that there is constitutional authority for a uniform bankruptcy system and there is no constitutional authority or grant for the others.

But the majority of the committee say our State laws are inadequate, that our State courts aid "in-the-family receiverships," and that under our State chancery courts and equity courts permit estates to be stolen.

I deny that assertion. The State laws are administered just as honestly and just as faithfully as the Federal courts can administer laws, and the administration of the State courts is more economical. Now, I ask the great business man from New York to listen to a business proposition from a man who does not pretend to be a great business man nor a profound constitutional lawyer, one so profound that he never made a mistake in his life.

I have examined the reports of the Attorney-General since this law has been enacted, and I call this to the attention of you, my fellow-laborers, representing poor people, representing business people, representing the whole country, not merely the representatives of such men as the Thurbers, who for a consideration go out and send letters broadcast through the country to influence "the leaders of thought." I am not addressing myself to such "leaders of thought" who will pay any attention to such circulars.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] the other day showed me a circular letter that had been sent out, requesting that letters and petitions be sent in here to Congressmen to influence them on this bill; all proper enough, but let us understand the source from whence they emanate.

Now, as I said, I have examined the reports of the Attorney-General since this law has been in effect. The act of July 1, 1898, did not permit the operation of the voluntary feature until the 1st day of August, 1898. It did not permit the operation of the involuntary feature of the law until the 1st day of November, 1898. Hence the report of the Attorney-General for 1898 has little or no information on the subject. But for the following three years I have extracted this information from his reports.

I find that in 1899-1901 the total assets in voluntary and involuntary cases were turned over to the bankrupt courts in amount of $105,906,716.63, the total assets turned over to the courts to be administered—these courts that some say are so much more honest and just and fair than are the State courts; that out of this $105,000,000 and upward of assets dividends were paid in 1899, 1900, and 1901 to the total amount of $6,513,530.57. Total dividends of a little upward of $6,000,000 were paid out of total assets of upward of $105,000,000.

I find further that these total dividends of upward of $6,000,000 were paid at a total cost during these years of $2,890,616.79. The court officials got about 45 cents or 46 cents for every dollar that was paid in dividends. In other words, I go out and collect for you. You turn me over $105,000,000 of assets. I am a faithful and honest collector; I come back with $6,000,000 out of a total of $105,000,000, and give you that, and I take about $3,000,000.

I give you $2 and take $1. What has become of the difference between the sum total of three millions of cost and fees and the six millions of dividends and the item of $105,000,000 of assets? What has become of that, in this honest administration of insolvent estates, the reports do not show. I here give in detail the assets, dividends, fees, and costs for the years I have mentioned.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. The $105,000,000 was the appraised value of the assets?

Mr. CLAYTON. No.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Has the gentleman got the selling price?

Mr. CLAYTON. I have the report. It does not say that it is the appraised value, or the selling, or what. It is put down as assets. It is the value of the assets of the estates, so far as the report shows. Well, of course if it is the appraised value, taking the case of an administrator, would not the administrator, in case the estate was appraised, have to account for the appraised value of the estate or to show reasons for so great a discrepancy?

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. That is, the debts are appraised at their face value.

Mr. BELLAMY. In a bankruptcy proceeding, in the schedule of assets returned, do not you have to put the nominal value, and what you are speaking of is the nominal value?

Mr. CLAYTON. The reports do not say, and it is not my understanding that it is that way; but that is not the question. The gentleman is sticking in the bark about assets. What I am after is that no court ought to make you pay a man one dollar for collecting two for you.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have a case in point.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman from Georgia, when it comes to details, is prepared to show how these estates are maladministered. He will give you the individual instances which he has extracted from the reports of the Attorney-General. I now submit a statement showing the total assets, total dividends, total fees and costs, and total liabilities in the voluntary and involuntary bankrupt cases in all the bankrupt courts in the United States for the years 1899, 1900, and 1901. These figures are taken from the reports of the Attorney-General for the years named.

How much time have I consumed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed twenty-six minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. After I shall have consumed four more minutes I should be pleased if you would inform me.

Now, Mr. Speaker, briefly as to some features of this bill. This bill seeks to say that no unfortunate debtor shall be discharged in bankruptcy oftener than once in six years. Now, it is claimed that this provision for the discharge of debtors is abused; that men avail themselves of it too frequently. If this be true, our answer is that the law can be repealed, so that he can not be discharged.

Then again, Mr. Speaker, nearly every crime under the laws of the United States—and there are no crimes against the United States except those denounced in the Federal Constitution and statutes—nearly every one of them is barred by statutes of limitations of less than six years; and yet this beneficent bankruptcy law is not only to take into its process a man and brand him with bankruptcy—almost a criminal appellation—but it tells him after he is so branded he shall labor under the burden of debt and under that infamy for six years before he can get another discharge, although he may have been forced into bankruptcy proceedings by his creditors and have made a clean showing and established his honesty? You sequester his estate and give him no discharge if he has had a discharge within six years. This is benevolence with a vengeance.

However meritorious your case may be, you must wait until the expiration of six years to get another discharge. Mr. Speaker, this bill also revives the provision of the bankruptcy law of 1867 allowing corporations to go into voluntary bankruptcy. I do not remember that when this bill was under discussion it was even attempted to include a corporation in the provisions of the law which allows them to take advantage of voluntary bankruptcy proceedings.

If I am not mistaken, it was then refused to give such privileges to corporations. This Congress ought not now to accord that privilege to corporations. That was one of the features that helped to condemn the law of 1867. If a corporation has made a failure; if it has been exploited by adventurers and it fails, it ought to end, and ought not to have the benefit of a discharge in bankruptcy.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to ask him if he thinks we fulfill the constitutional injunction when the voluntary and involuntary features are not joined?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; Mr. Webster, if I recollect right, when the bankruptcy law of 1841 was under discussion, answered that direct question, and gave it as his opinion that we could create a uniform bankruptcy system and make it apply to voluntary cases only. It has always been my understanding that you could make a uniform system of bankruptcy and let it be simply a voluntary bankruptcy proceeding. I believe that is the law now. You know that the lack of uniformity in the exemption laws of the different States and various other differences do not render a bankrupt act nonuniform in the constitutional sense. I refer the gentleman to In re Beckerford, 4 N. B. R., 203, and to 1 Dill., 45. Again I cite him to the cases holding that distinction between natural and artificial persons does not render a bankruptcy act nonuniform (1 N. B. R., 387, and 95 F. R., 637). And, again, the uniformity required by the Constitution is geographical and not personal in the sense of being alike applicable to all members of society. The Constitution requires uniformity in administration only (In re Jordon, 1 N. B. R., 180).

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are other features in this bill that I would like to take up and discuss and point out, but in the time allowed I will not be able to fully criticise the bill in detail unless we have an opportunity under the five-minute rule. I now yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]; but first I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia two minutes to offer an amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the Clerk read an amendment which I have to section 3.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair deems it his duty to state to the gentleman from Alabama that if he yields for the purpose of offering an amendment he will lose the floor.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, if that is the ruling of the Chair I do not think the gentleman from Georgia will insist.

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly not.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I yield to the gentleman from Missouri such time as he desires and reserve the balance of the time that is not used. But before doing so I submit the views of the minority of the committee:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

When the existing bankruptcy act was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the House on December 16, 1897, the minority of the committee said:

"We do not believe the bill, * * * with the extensive powers it confers on the Federal courts, is a wise and just measure or one that should be passed."

And now we submit that trial and experience have demonstrated the manifold imperfections of the act, and that many cases of injustice have come from its operation, so that we are now asked to make the amendments proposed in this bill, H. R. 13679.

It is doubtless true that the financial depression of 1893 and the years immediately following furnished many instances where it seemed that the unfortunate condition of debtors justified relief to them through the medium of a uniform system of bankruptcy. Doubtless in many cases State insolvency laws were inadequate because of the constitutional inhibition against the State to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, as well as the limitation upon the power of the State precluding it from enacting any law of extraterritorial force.

It was argued, in effect, on this floor and in the report of the committee in favor of this act, that "the provisions of this bill (now the bankruptcy law) carry bankruptcy legislation into the domain of humanity to our debtors and creditors," and also that the shortcomings and imperfections and the excessive cost bills of the former bankruptcy laws had been remedied in the act which we are now called upon to either amend or repeal. The very able report above referred to, filed in behalf of the existing law by Mr. HENDERSON (now the Speaker) in the Fifty-fifth Congress, contains a full history of bankruptcy legislation in this country.

The first bankruptcy law lived from April 4, 1800, to December 19, 1803; the second lived from August 19, 1841, to March 3, 1843, and the third lived from March 2, 1867, to September 1, 1878. The fourth bankruptcy law, now under consideration, was approved July 1, 1898. We mention this to show that while our country has grown in wealth and population as no other country every did in the world's history, yet from the adoption of the Constitution to this good hour, a period of about one hundred and fourteen years, we have had bankruptcy laws at different times covering altogether about twenty-five years. Whether all of the reasons that led to the enactment of former bankruptcy laws obtained in the case of the present one, or whether all the reasons for their repeal are pertinent in the present case is perhaps immaterial

It seems to be a correct statement to say that the American people have not heretofore favored a permanent bankruptcy system, and we do not believe that they now favor it. We do not believe that such laws, however wisely framed, and although allowable under the Constitution, are a credit to any people or age. Such a law is a menace to the honest, conscientious, painstaking merchant wherever located and without regard to the magnitude of his business. We call attention to the fact that the present act is the most drastic and oppressive law, so far as the unfortunate debtor is concerned, that has ever been enacted, and we shall hereafter invite attention to some of the proposed amendments, which would make this law more harsh, and in our opinion more indefensible.

Under this law, as it is proposed here to amend it, the rights of honest and unfortunate debtors who are forced into bankruptcy are minimized, and these debtors are assumed to be guilty of acts hardly short of criminal. They can not obtain relief from their creditors, who have forced bankruptcy upon them, without being first subjected to possible harsh treatment, as harsh as exacting creditors and shrewd collection lawyers can devise. Even when relieved, they are branded with the almost criminal appellation of "bankrupt," and a large part of their assets have been uselessly dissipated in fees and costs.

As a virtue, it is said that some of the amendments to the present bankruptcy law seek to make it impossible for the dishonest debtor to get relief from his debts through bankruptcy. If this is as it should be (and about that we make no dispute), then the dishonest debtor can certainly be deprived of all opportunity of undeserved relief by a repeal of the bankruptcy law, thus leaving him liable for his debts, as he would be without the provisions of this bill, seeking to make his discharge impossible.

That the retention of the present bankruptcy law is in accord with a general demand is a doubtful question, even in the minds of some of those who here and now advocate the permanent retention of the law, may be inferred from the fact that the chairman of the committee, who filed the report in behalf of the present bill, amendatory of the act, sent many copies of a circular letter to people in different parts of the country, as his report states, in which he asked the recipients of the letters to say, among other things, whether the present bankruptcy law should be amended, left as it is, or repealed.

It may be that nearly all the circular letters were sent to wholesale merchants and jobbers, bankruptcy lawyers, referees in bankruptcy, and other court officials interested in the cost features of the bankruptcy law. In his report the chairman does not tell us how many or how few replies he received to his circular letter. He assures us that only 10 per cent of the replies received opposed the retention of the law. In coming to his conclusion as to the popularity of the measure, it may be that the chairman was largely convinced by the silence of the people addressed, as we are led to believe by his statement in the circular letter that—

"In case you (the recipient of the letter) do not return this paper as requested, it will be assumed that you are satisfied with the existing conditions under the present national bankruptcy law."

We have not been told that the unfortunate debtor's side was presented. The man who has gone voluntarily into bankruptcy and made an honest showing has been, in some degree, considered in this legislation; but it does seem to make the unfortunate debtor, who has been put into involuntary bankruptcy when he was conducting a going business, and who thereby has had his business, credit, and character ruined, subject to every inquisitorial method and harsh measure that commercial lawyers and hard-hearted creditors can suggest.

The drastic provisions of this bill show that in the minds of at least some of its promoters every involuntary bankrupt is deemed to be a thief and a scoundrel from the very inception of the proceedings against him. The resort to this unusual remedy is tantamount to an indictment against the unfortunate debtor. It is no answer to say that he may have a jury trial, under certain conditions, and thereby have his innocence established. He has already been ruined and branded, and there is no adequate remedy, no reparation. But what cares the rapacious creditor for the ruin of a hundred honest men, so that he may at some time catch one dishonest man and force him to disgorge assets that should be applied to his just debts?

The debtor class is entitled to some consideration in bankruptcy legislation. We can very well understand why some wholesale dealers and jobbers, bankruptcy lawyers, referees, trustees, marshals, and clerks of courts might desire the retention of the present bankruptcy law, and favor certain amendments. We think it fair to say that some wholesale dealers and jobbers favor such retention and some of the amendments proposed, because they would like to use the law more and more as a collection machine, and we can understand why referees and others who are interested in the fees from the bankrupt estates desire the enactment of these amendments, increasing their compensation.

But we submit that these should not be our controlling reasons, however just may be some of these demands or suggestions, when we are called upon to legislate for the whole people. Even the improvement of a system essentially bad is not as good as its abolishment. If we ought to be slow about relieving unfortunate debtors and hedge about with many restrictions possible relief to them, as this bill proposes, we ought to be equally slow about conferring new and harsh remedies upon exacting creditors through the medium of extraordinary powers given to the Federal courts and court officials whereby any of the debtor class may be unjustly oppressed or harassed.

We ought to legislate with the idea uppermost in our minds that the creditor class in our country is not as a rule more honest and just and more to be trusted with power and authority than the debtor class, and that the interests of the one are no more worthy of legislative consideration than those of the other.

Let us examine some of the provisions of the pending bill. The first amendment proposed in this bill shows that the committee sympathizes with the tendency manifested by the friends of the bankruptcy law to make it more and more drastic so far as the debtor is concerned, and to render him more and more at the mercy of his creditors through the medium of new and extraordinary remedies.

It is true that this first amendment adverted to, recognizing as it does that the divergence in the exemption laws of the respective States does not render the bankruptcy law nonuniform, as has been settled by repeated adjudications, yet its avowed object is to avoid the effect of the inequalities of the exemption laws of the different States.

The purpose of this amendment is to put every debtor who is allowed exemptions under the State laws, in case his solvency is in question, upon the same footing, as would be in the case of a debtor in a State having no exemption law, or in a case where the debtor owns no homestead. In other words, this is an effort in some degree, and for at least one purpose, to nullify the effect of the exemptions which the State has given to her citizens. We are not in favor of a Federal statute minimizing or avoiding in any degree the effect of State exemption laws.

The creditor has no right to complain that the State, in its wisdom and for the purpose of preventing the possibility of one of its citizens or his family becoming a public burden, has exempted certain property from the payment of debts. The creditor knew this law of the State and its possible effect, and he extended credit in the light of such knowledge, and he has no right to complain when business misfortune overtakes his debtor. It is a step in advance of any definition heretofore given to insolvency to say that the homestead and personal property exemptions in a bankruptcy proceeding, which may have been thrust upon an unwilling and honest debtor, shall not be reckoned when the debtor is made the victim of this harsh involuntary process.

Every State in the Union, and all the Territories, have provided some sort of exemption laws, and the wisdom of the same ought not to be impeached indirectly by a Federal statute declaring in effect that an honest debtor shall not be given credit for common prudence in providing a necessary home for himself and his family. The creditor has no right to complain of injustice growing up out of the exemption laws of any State.

Sections 2, 10, and 11 of the pending bill increase the fees of the court officials, and are in line with the exorbitant charges that rendered the administration of the bankruptcy law of 1867 scandalous and odious; and we predict that the compensation here demanded will be followed from time to time by like demands as long as the bankruptcy law stands. It is a well-known fact that the referees in bankruptcy now have a national association, and it may not be too much to say that increase of compensation, whether right or wrong—and any man can persuade himself that his pay is inadequate—is with them the "paramount object of patriotic desire."

In regard to section 3 of the bill, we do not subscribe to the statement made by the committee in respect thereto, that in the States there are "present notorious inequities practiced on creditors through in-the-family accountings and directorial receiverships under State laws." We believe that under State laws the administration of justice is as wise and as good as can be had under Federal statutes and through Federal courts.

We do not believe it proper to give to corporations the right to go into voluntary bankruptcy, which this bill proposes to do. If a corporation has made a failure it ought to go out of business; it ought to end. We think that a provision allowing a corporation the privilege of voluntary bankruptcy will be subject to great abuse.

Section 5 of the bill interposes new obstacles to the discharge of the involuntary bankrupt. The report says a discharge is a boon, not a right. We dissent from this view. As long as there is a bankrupt law an unfortunate and honest debtor is entitled, as a matter of right, upon proper showing, to a discharge from his debts.

Section 7 interferes with the settled policy of some of the States and makes the wife an involuntary witness in certain transactions. We submit that these States have the right to regulate their domestic affairs, and have a right to refuse to make the wife a witness in any case against the husband, if the lawmakers of the State believe that such a course is most conducive to harmonious family relations.

Even if we were to concede, though we do not, that there ought to be a limit to the right of the debtor to discharge, we affirm that one discharge in six years is carrying the restriction too far, especially in case a man is made an involuntary bankrupt and shows that he is entitled, under the narrow provisions of this law, to a discharge. In all cases we believe that the bankrupt, voluntary and involuntary, ought to be discharged as often as he makes the showing required by the act.

Most crimes against the United States are barred by statutes of limitation of less than six years. If debtors are to be forgiven at all, there is no reason for being less generous to them than to criminals.

While we have urged objection to some of the amendments proposed in the pending bill, we think there are other reasons why the bill should not pass.

We believe that the public interests will be subserved by the repeal of the present bankruptcy law. Five bills for this purpose have been introduced in the House at the present session of Congress, and two for the same purpose have been introduced in the Senate.

It will be remembered that when the bankruptcy act was under consideration in the Fifty-fifth Congress the amendment to limit its operation to two years was adopted, and that subsequently this limitation was defeated by a very narrow majority vote.

We do not believe that there is any necessity or any general public demand for the longer retention of the law. It has tended to burden the Federal courts with much litigation, which we believe could be just as well conducted by the courts of the different States. We believe that the people of the various States favor and uphold just and honest laws, and that the State courts administer justice as honestly, faithfully, and efficiently as do the Federal courts. Bankruptcy laws and other unnecessary Federal legislation, creating new civil remedies and new penal offenses, are unnecessarily burdening the Federal courts, and the administration of public justice is not bettered thereby.

We submit House bill 4574, as a substitute, and recommend its passage, it being in the following words:

"A bill to repeal an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' be, and is hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing herein shall in any way affect proceedings under said act begun prior to the time this act takes effect."

H. D. CLAYTON.
W. H. FLEMING.
DAVID A. DE ARMOND.
D. H. SMITH.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that a bankruptcy law to be fair and useful must have a limited existence; and that it ought to have no existence whatever except at stated intervals, when the general condition of the country is such that, for the relief of those who are overwhelmed by debt, some means beyond those which ordinarily exist should be supplied.

I do not believe in a bankruptcy law the main object and purpose and office of which are to enable the creditor to bear down more heavily upon the debtor, thus giving him less opportunity of taking care of himself and escaping bankruptcy. Hence, I was opposed to the passage of this bankruptcy law when it was adopted some four years ago, and I believe the time surely has arrived—no matter how necessary and proper the law may have been thought then—I do not think it was necessary or proper in its present form, but passing that, I believe that surely the time has now arrived when the bankrupt law ought to be repealed.

We are now to consider the question whether this bankrupt law shall be retained upon the statute book as a permanent feature of our jurisprudence, or whether it is better to repeal it and allow the people to get along, as during most of the history of our country they have got along, without a bankrupt law.

Aside from the question of whether the entire law is to be repealed, I believe the effect of the passage of this bill will be to make bad worse. This bill, as I think will be evident to anyone who studies it and ought to be evident to anyone who reads it attentively and compares it, even superficially, with the existing law, is designed for the purpose of "perfecting" the law, as they call it, from the standpoint of the capitalistic class of the country, and not from the standpoint of the insolvent debtors or those who may become insolvent under its operation.

One effect of it will be to transfer more surely the business of the several communities of the country to the centers of population, to the great money centers of the country. The legislation is distinctly against the interests of the local business men and the local professional men and is distinctly in the interest of those who are congregated in the large cities and are powerful through accumulated wealth in the metropolitan business and professional life. The banker and the lawyer and the business man in the small country place, the comparatively small place, will be sacrificed for the benefit of the mightier banker, the greater lawyer, and the wealthier business classes in the great cities of the country. That is the inevitable tendency, and, with all due deference to those who support the bill (and I am not questioning the motives of anybody), it seems to me that if they have studied it carefully it must be their conscious purpose to accomplish that. Because whatever this bill will accomplish must be in the contemplation of those who are favoring its passage, so that they must be held to desire to accomplish that which its passage will accomplish.

One provision is to increase the fees of the officers called into being by the bankruptcy law, as well as the others who are its official beneficiaries. There is no necessity whatever that the increase be made. This increase is distinctively for the benefit of this office-holding class, created by this law in large part, the functions of others largely increased by it, and in no sense is it in the interest of the unfortunate debtors of the country.

Mr. LANHAM. I wish to ask my friend whether he does not believe that the greatest demand for amending the present bankruptcy law comes from this source which he has just described—from official persons who are interested in the increase of fees and costs of administering bankrupt assets?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I have no doubt that every one of these officials who will be benefited by this bill directly as an office-holder is lending the benefit of his valuable counsel and influence to persuade the Congress of the United States that it is very essential for the public good that he be better taken care of than he is under the existing law.

Mr. LANHAM. Does not the gentleman think that the clamor for the amendment of the existing law comes from that source?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I have no doubt that these gentlemen are very influential factors in it. It is perfectly natural that they should be.

Mr. LANHAM. I wish to say that I thoroughly agree with my friend in his opposition to any increase of the costs in administering these bankruptcy assets.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not the fact that the agitation for the increase of these fees of referees was started by a gathering or association of the referees of the United States bankruptcy courts held last summer, and that they are very largely the class who have agitated the question and have brought the petitions here in favor of this amendment of the law?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think, Mr. Speaker, that is true. But however this bill originated, and whoever is behind it, and whoever is most influential in the movement, I wish to say, in passing, that one object of the proposed legislation is, and one certain effect of it will be, to increase the fees and emoluments of those who administer the law, to the very great gratification, no doubt, of each and every one of them.

Another effect will be to change the law of evidence in some States where the wife is not a competent witness in any affair of a civil nature in which the husband is interested as a party. Why is this done? It is done because the class of people adverse to the bankrupt fancy they can get some benefit out of it, not because the unfortunate debtors of the country, seeking relief through a bankruptcy law, believe it will be of any benefit to them, or are asking that the change be made.

The truth is—and it may all be said in one word on this point—there is not a line in this amendatory bill that is suggested by any agency or any interest in the United States that represents or is connected in a beneficial way with the debtors of the country who may avail themselves of a bankruptcy law.

Now, one of the provisions of this amendatory bill is that insolvents shall be denied relief in bankruptcy proceedings oftener than once in six years. It is said that in many instances persons have made an industry of going into bankruptcy—have acquired credit, absorbed what they could gather from unsuspecting creditors, and then plunged into bankruptcy, wiped out the old score, and by aid of a little perjury (which to them I suppose amounts to little) have gone away with the fruits of their evil doings.

All agree that as to those people—as to those who go into voluntary bankruptcy corruptly and dishonestly, for the purpose of defrauding their creditors—there ought not to be that relief which comes from a discharge in bankruptcy. The very fact that this rascally use and abuse of the bankrupt law frequently occurs, as no doubt it does, is at once an impeachment and condemnation of the law itself. Everybody knows—all experience has demonstrated—that bankruptcy laws are abused, and that many seek their aid, not as bona fide unfortunate debtors seeking relief from debts which they can not pay, but as scoundrels to cover up and save property which by scoundrelly acts they have gathered from unsuspecting creditors, managing under even the best of bankruptcy acts to escape the liability which otherwise would rest upon them. That is one of the reasons why bankruptcy laws should never exist except for a short period of time, as emergency legislation for an emergency. They will always be abused; some men, too many men, always will make an industry of abusing them. Such is the business of certain fraudulent bankrupts, the bankrupts who, as a way to wealth, go into bankruptcy for what they can make out of it.

How about the other bankrupt—the honest but unfortunate debtor, the venturous man, if you please, the misguided man—who through bankruptcy proceedings is relieved from the obligation of his debts and engages in business again, and who, perhaps through bad management, perhaps through misfortune, is again overwhelmed with financial disaster and again thrown into a bankruptcy court, and when his assets are administered asks for his discharge so that he may begin again; is he freed from the burden of debts which he can not pay? There is an "improvement" here providing that if a man has been once discharged or denied a discharge in bankruptcy within six years there can be no discharge for him. No matter how honest he may have been, no matter how meritorious his case, the mere fact that he has been in the bankruptcy court and has been discharged or been denied a discharge within six years bars him from being relieved again in the same way.

His position may be that of a man who says, "You put me into the bankruptcy court once; I have gone through and been discharged. I believe I can get along without further relief of this kind. I do not want to go into your bankruptcy court any more." But he is to have nothing to say about it. Additional provisions are added by this bill under which he can be thrown into involuntary bankruptcy. He is helpless then, his credit gone, his business taken away—he is lost, it may be within a year, it may be within five years of his former discharge in bankruptcy—if this bill passes as it now is the man thrown into bankruptcy involuntarily will be denied a discharge solely upon the ground, if all other reasons for his discharge coexist, that he was or was not discharged before within six years.

To my mind that is an abomination. Who suggests it? Where does it come from? It comes from the collecting agency, from the men interested in oppressing instead of relieving the poor; it comes from those who would make worse the condition of the unfortunate, instead of from any who would relieve from financial misfortunes.

The general course of the law is to be interfered with in a great many ways. For instance, among other things, the trustee is required to-day to pay the taxes upon the bankrupt estate. With care and prudence now they provide in this bill that the taxes upon the homestead and other exempt property, whatever it may be, shall not be paid out of the bankruptcy fund.

In other words, here is a man crowded into bankruptcy. He believes he can swim, he believes he can go through the storm, can escape what some men regard as the reproach of being adjudged a bankrupt; every part of his property is taken possession of, except that which is absolutely exempt under the law. It may be that he has been carrying a pretty heavy load and has, in developing all his available means to the payment of his debts, allowed taxes to accumulate to a considerable extent upon that very property which is exempt; namely, the shelter for wife and children, the food upon which they are to live, the household furnishings which are absolutely essential to their existence.

Now, if this amendatory bill shall be passed, if this "reform measure" be enacted to "perfect the law," if this "reform" shall be made, then, after there is taken from the involuntary bankrupt all but that which is absolutely exempted by the law and which can not be reached, with nothing to pay taxes except by the sacrifice of that which it is the policy of the law to preserve—not particularly for his benefit, but for the benefit of helpless women and children—his condition will be pitiable indeed. The shelter for wife and child may be swept away by the tax collector, because not a penny of his estate, be it great or small, is to go toward the payment of those taxes.

The fact is that at every point where an officer in bankruptcy, where the agent of a large collecting establishment, where the powerful who make wealth out of the oppression of the poor, where these believe that the screws can be put a little tighter, believe that the weight can be made a little heavier, believe that the burden can be made a little harder to bear, believe that the slavery of debt can be made a little more complete—everywhere that any of these "reforms" can be accomplished according to the ingenuity of those who have studied them well and apprehend them fully, this bill provides for the case.

I have not time to go through all these amendments embodied in this bill. They can be summed up, in a general way, under two or three heads. One is to increase the fees and emoluments of officers. Here is an instance: The trustee is paid now a percentage on what he distributes. Is that harmful to the creditor or the debtor? He is to be paid under this revised bill—this "reform measure," this measure that "perfects" the law—a percentage upon what he handles; and so it goes clear through. Ten-dollar fees are to be doubled.

There are additional grounds of bankruptcy found and put into this bill, lest by chance some unfortunate debtor might escape the net of the reformer Shylock. The notice necessary to be given when a petition is filed against an involuntary bankrupt under the law as it now exists is too long. It is shortened—hurry them to the gallows. Why stop? Why pause? Swift and complete let your progress be. Shorten the notice; hurry the execution! Now, what is the object of that? What man can conceive of an object in it, except that which is beneficial to the powerful agency which forces the bankruptcy, and may be prejudicial, and probably will be, to the helpless victim of the proceedings?

To enumerate, here are some of the additional obstacles to a discharge in bankruptcy: The great object is first to make it easier and swifter and surer to force into bankruptcy anybody you choose to put there. Next, to limit still further the victim's prospect for relief. There is no protection for the man wrongfully thrown there. If he is involved in debt, if he is in embarrassed circumstances financially, he is ruined by the filing of the petition. They have made swifter and more secure the course of the man who assails him, and less to hope for is left to the unfortunate.

These are some of the additional things that bar the bankrupt from relief.

(3) Obtained property on credit upon a materially false statement in writing made by him to any person for the purpose of obtaining credit, or of being communicated to the trade or to the person from whom he obtained such property on credit; or (4) made a fraudulent transfer of any portion of his property to any person; or (5) been granted or denied a discharge in bankruptcy within six years.

Having been denied a discharge within six years, thrown into bankruptcy again after six years from the day a discharge is granted, after six years from the day a discharge is denied there may be a hope for the hapless bankrupt, but during the six years, whether he rests under the disability of being a bankrupt without a discharge, or whether he was discharged during the six years, though he may be thrown into bankruptcy never so wrongfully, though he may be made to suffer never so cruelly, though the outrage upon him may be unparalleled, there is no discharge for the six years anyhow for the doomed wretch. His doom may be awful, but there is to be no escape from it. Honesty, helplessness, good faith, misfortune, charity, humanity—nothing saves him! The six years' limit absolutely bars him.

Not only that. The phraseology of the law is to be further amended in regard to this matter of discharge. The way of the helpless bankrupt must be made hard indeed. Not only are these conditions imposed, but there is a change of the existing phraseology. Under the existing law a fraudulent intent is to some extent necessary, as witness this provision:

Or with a fraudulent intent to conceal his real financial condition, and in contemplation of bankruptcy, destroyed, concealed, or failed to keep books of account.

By this bill the word "fraudulent" is taken out of that, the word "true" is taken out of it, and the words "in contemplation of bankruptcy" are taken out of it, narrowing it just as much as possible. And that "reformed" provision bars from a discharge. And so it goes, from beginning to end of this bill.

I will not dwell upon another feature of the bill before us, though in my judgment hours would hardly suffice for all the words of condemnation which it merits. I refer to the provision for enabling corporations to become voluntary bankrupts and to be discharged as such from the obligation of their debts and liabilities.

Let him pretend who will that he yearns for a bankruptcy law for the relief of insolvent debtors, his proposal to give acquittances to corporations must ever raise doubts in my mind as to whether he is entirely sincere or as to whether his diagnosis of his own motives has been scientific enough to furnish him with a full measure of enlightenment.

Permit corporations to become voluntary bankrupts, and thus to be freed from the burden of their debts, and you open wide the door to fraud. Thus may a corporation be wrecked, to the great injury of its innocent stockholders, and thus may the innocent creditors of a corporation be undone.

Honest corporations, honestly managed, need no bankruptcy law. Dishonest corporations and corporations dishonestly managed deserve none.

When a corporation is swamped the wreck may be deserted and another corporation may be created; but it is quite another thing to desert a man when he is swamped, for your laws can not create another man at will. This provision lacks charity in appearance as it does humanity in fact.

The law which is so framed as to deny relief oftener than every six years, if at all, to poor, suffering men, while it is prodigal in its helpfulness to man's creature, the corporation, no doubt merits corporate benedictions, but I believe it deserves to be accursed for its inhumanity to man.

The whole question, Mr. Speaker, is a very simple one. It is, first, whether four years of this bankrupt law are not enough; whether there ought not to be a repeal of the law and an absolute prevention, by the repeal, of the fraudulent practices of those who resort to the bankrupt courts for the purpose of obtaining discharges in order to conceal and keep and preserve safe what they have stolen; whether there ought not to be a repeal in order to protect those who are the victims of those others who would oppress; whether there ought not to be a repeal of the law so that the people may do their business, collect their debts, have their financial and their personal confidences and security back in their own communities, where they are known and pass for what they are; whether the law should not again be so that friend may help friend in distress without himself being held guilty—without the friend being guilty of an act of bankruptcy in attempting or accepting with gratitude an act of humanity.

As it is now, a man in straitened circumstances applying to his neighbor for aid, and the neighbor lending the aid with the assurance that he will be protected if bad comes to worse, is committing an act of bankruptcy. To go to a friend and rely upon friendship, to render the offices of friendship to a friend in distress, is now to stand stamped as a criminal; and they are by this bill adding to the "criminality" of a generous act and increasing the penalties. And so the question next is, Should this bill be passed?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri this question: Suppose the bankruptcy act were repealed, what relief, then, would the debtor have? I take it that the only relief he could have must be under the insolvency law of his State, and that would not relieve him from oppression by creditors residing outside the State, would it?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I have heard of no demand on the part of the debtors anywhere for the relief that a continuance of the bankruptcy law will give.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Do you understand that any State insolvency law can relieve a debtor in a State from a claim that is held outside of the State?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, no.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. So that without a national bankruptcy act, the debtor would have no relief except such relief as he can get in the State in which he resides?

Mr. DE ARMOND. And by arrangement with his creditors; of course, I understand that.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. But if he could not make an arrangement with his creditors outside, he could not get the relief.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Of course not. If the very worst that is possible should come to him without the bankruptcy law, he would be no worse off than he would be for six years under this amended bill, provided he had ever been through bankruptcy. You condemn him for six years absolutely, while in the States and under the old law he has some hope from the mercy or the generosity or the business sense of his creditors; but from this ironbound, ironclad, oppressive, outrageous law he would have absolutely none. The door of hope would be shut.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Just one more question. Do you know of any State where an insolvency law ever existed that permitted a debtor to go through insolvency oftener than once in six years?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, yes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. A great many of them.

Mr. DE ARMOND. All the debtor asks under the insolvency law of a State is that his estate be distributed, and it is distributed under the law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, the amendment to strike out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama has offered no amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Do I understand the Chair to say that the gentleman from Alabama has not offered the amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He has not offered it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Then I offer that amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the matter that is at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"That the act approved July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing herein shall in any way affect proceedings under said act begun prior to the taking effect of this act, and this act shall take effect ninety days after the approval thereof."

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve a point of order on that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Had we not just as well dispose of the point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I did not understand the statement of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order will be reserved, unless the gentleman insists on its being made at once.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Of course I have no objection to that. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand what the point of order is. I understand that one was reserved, but I should like to know what it is.

Mr. RAY of New York. Are you through now?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I was just asking for information. I am now upon the question of the amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve the unused time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not understand the situation. I want to reserve the unused time that I yielded to the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is four minutes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I offered an amendment, and I desire to know what is the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has not used all the time by four minutes. The gentleman offers an amendment, upon which he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I want to know what the point of order is.

Mr. LANHAM. That it is not germane to the bill, which is a proposition to amend certain sections of the law. If I understand the amendment, it is to repeal the existing law—all law on the subject of bankruptcy.

Mr. BARTLETT. What is the point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri is not germane to the pending bill.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Before the gentleman from Missouri goes into that question I want to ask him——

Mr. DE ARMOND. One moment. Mr. Speaker, as this is a very important matter, I think we might just as well have it decided here. I desire to hear what gentlemen have to say upon that question and dispose of it. If the gentleman who raises the point of order, Mr. Speaker, does not desire to be heard, I would like to say a word or two upon the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. RAY of New York. I reserved the point of order. I supposed that we would dispose of that at a later time.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think that we had better pass on it now, and then we will know what to do.

Mr. RAY of New York. I have not my copy of the rules before me. The Speaker, the gentleman now in the chair, is a skilled parliamentarian, and for me to talk parliamentary law to him would seem to be a unique performance—a performance I do not care to indulge in, to any great extent at least. But it does seem to me a common-sense idea that the proposition here to amend certain specified sections of the bankruptcy law—a general law containing a great many sections, being a complete law, a complete act in itself—is not amendable by a proposition to repeal the entire law, wipe it out of existence; that entire repeal should not be in order on the proposed amendment; that it should not be germane to the bill which the committee has presented to the House and which the House is now discussing and is to pass upon. We do not propose by this amendment to change the entire law; we do not propose to modify or enlarge the entire law. Repeal has nothing to do with our propositions, which are presented from the committee, but it is a proposition entirely disconnected therewith and inconsistent. A proposition to wipe out of existence a law which we propose to improve, which we propose in certain respects to amend and make more perfect, is not amended by repealing the law. This question may have been passed upon many times. I have not had time to examine it; but it does seem to me as an original proposition that it can not be germane to the bill now before the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in that connection. Does not the pending bill repeal certain features of the bankruptcy law?

Mr. RAY of New York. Not at all. It does not expressly repeal a single sentence or word in it.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt right on that?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In just so far as an amendment goes it is a repeal of some of the features of the present bankruptcy law.

Mr. RAY of New York. It does not repeal anything. It is an addition to some extent, and it is in an addition making more clear and explicit the provisions of the law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Permit me to continue the interruption a moment. Your bill now pending does amend features in the present bankruptcy law?

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly; that is the purpose of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, then, it is not possible to amend an existing law without repealing or qualifying certain features of the existing law.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not agree with the gentleman at all in that statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let me finish the question.

Mr. RAY of New York. That might be in the way the amendment was made, and it would depend upon the amendment in my judgment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is it possible to amend existing law except in one of two ways—either by limiting or by extending the capacity and operation of the existing law? Is there any other way to amend a law?

Mr. RAY of New York. That could be done by addition to, without a repeal of, any part.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Can you amend a law without either adding to it or taking from it?

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, I do not know that you could. I do not think you could amend it unless you either add to it or take from it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And then, unless it was an idle pretense, any amendment adds to or takes from the existing law. Is it not true that your pending bill in certain features adds to and in certain other features takes from the existing law? And if it be true that the pending bill is pro tanto a repeal either by addition or by subtraction of existing law, is not a further addition or further subtraction always germane to the addition or subtraction sought to be enacted?

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, by simply adding to existing law you do not repeal it at all. Now, by taking one provision away you might, to a certain extent, repeal that particular provision, but you would not repeal the law.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman one minute? I do not think he remembers one feature of this bill or he would not have answered one question by the gentleman from Mississippi the same as he did. The gentleman from New York said that this bill did not repeal any part of the existing law.

Mr. RAY of New York. It does not in terms, does it?

Mr. CLAYTON. This report on page 2 says:

> The next amendment, section 5 of the bill, makes definite and certain the purpose of the law as it was framed, to wit, that the words "in contemplation of bankruptcy" mean a present or future state of insolvency and purpose to take advantage of the law.

Now, as I understand it, this bill strikes out from the original law these words: "in contemplation of bankruptcy."

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CLAYTON. What is the change?

Mr. RAY of New York. Look at the bill. Of course, in some respects we do strike out words and add some words, making a broader meaning. In terms we do not repeal any section.

Mr. CLAYTON. You do not have to repeal a whole section; you can repeal provisions by implication.

Mr. RAY of New York. I understand all that. We will not go into refinement. What I intended to say in reply to the gentleman was that we do not in terms repeal any section or any portion of any section. We do change some language and add some language, and you could not make an amendment without doing that.

Mr. CLAYTON. But you do repeal some provisions in the existing law.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not concede that; I have denied it.

Mr. LANHAM. In every instance where an amendment is suggested these words were implied: "And the section is hereby amended so as to read as follows," and there is no purpose to interfere with the general body of existing law.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I find in the gentleman's report, on page 5, the following language——

Mr. RAY of New York. I wish the gentleman would not take up time unnecessarily unless it is for the purpose of instructing the occupant of the chair. I do not want him to ask me questions on parliamentary law, because I am not competent to answer them; to ask many questions of one knowing no more than I do about it would be a ridiculous performance. But I will answer the gentleman's question the best I can.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I find on page 5 of the report this language:

> Section 5 modifies one of the present objections to a discharge and adds four new objections.

Mr. RAY of New York. I have stated repeatedly, and now if the gentleman has not heard me, let me state it so he can hear. We do add to this bill, but I deny that the addition or provision repeals existing law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will excuse me, thus far I have read his own language and have not asked a question. Now, the question I want to ask is this: If in the pending bill you deny a discharge upon four new grounds, which, under the existing bankrupt law, could be granted, then why is not it germane to extend by amendment the objections which you have in the bill extended to a discharge?

Mr. RAY of New York. So that nobody could be discharged.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course not. Your present bill now pending denies to a man, who, the day before the passage of the bill, could have been discharged, the right to be discharged; and why is it not germane to add to that list men who, prior to the passage of the law, could be discharged, but afterwards could not be discharged, not in a few categories but all categories?

Mr. RAY of New York. If that was the general tenor and purpose of our bill that would be germane, but that is not what you propose. You are proposing to wipe out of existence the entire law. You do not propose to add to causes that are grounds for a refusal to discharge.

Mr. BELLAMY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. There are 70 sections in the bankrupt law?

Mr. RAY of New York. I think so.

Mr. BELLAMY. Your bill simply proposes to amend certain sections of the bill?

Mr. RAY of New York. Seven or eight of them, I think; possibly more.

Mr. BELLAMY. And the rest are left intact?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes.

Mr. BELLAMY. It does not affect the whole bill?

Mr. RAY of New York. The general purpose of the law is unaffected by the general proposition of our bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to be heard on the point of order for a minute or two.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is on the floor.

Mr. CLAYTON. Can not anybody be heard in opposition to the gentleman's parliamentary proposition?

Mr. RAY of New York. So far as I am concerned, I do not think I can throw any light upon the question at all. The present occupant of the chair is an experienced parliamentarian, who was studying parliamentary law before I came to Congress, and I have made no study of it at all. I have picked up some things, surely, but bow to the occupant of the chair. I am perfectly willing to leave the question to the present occupant of the chair. Of course, on this question——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman ought to tell us what his argument is, so that we can answer it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is almost impossible to speak a sentence in the presence of certain of my respected colleagues—gentlemen for whom I have the highest regard—without interruption. It does seem to me as if they were trying to fool away the time. Now, as I understand—if I am incorrect, the Chair will please correct me—as I understand, without interfering with the general debate we are discussing simply the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. RAY of New York. If that be so, I will yield the floor. There is nothing more of interest that I can say on the subject.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself for a minute or two to the point of order only, and I do so with some reluctance because of the well-known fact that the present occupant of the chair is well versed in parliamentary law; much more so than I am, and therefore I content myself with making a suggestion and citing some precedents, to which I ask the attention of the Chair.

We ought to come back to the question, What is it we have under consideration? This bill proposes to amend the bankruptcy law by providing certain amendments to it which materially change the present law on that subject and which in effect virtually repeal certain provisions now existing.

Let me refer to one important particular in which this proposed bill absolutely repeals a certain section of the existing bankruptcy law. We know that in the present law it was provided by an amendment in the House on a vote which changed the bill known as the Henderson bill as reported from the Judiciary Committee, and but for which change I doubt very much if that bill could have become a law at all—a provision requiring that all suits brought by trustees of a bankrupt to recover property which had been conveyed by the bankrupt prior to his bankruptcy should be brought in that court alone which would have had jurisdiction if no bankruptcy had taken place. That is an express provision of the existing bankruptcy law—a provision inserted by the House in 1899 by an amendment offered on the floor of the House and advocated most strenuously, as I remember, by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Now, because of the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States since the passage of that bill has decided that a United States court has no jurisdiction to hear and determine cases for the recovery of property which was conveyed by the bankrupt prior to his adjudication, and therefore where the parties are both citizens of the same States, the State court has the sole jurisdiction and a United States court has no jurisdiction; because of that decision, this bill proposes to repeal absolutely that section of the bankruptcy law by declaring that the United States courts in such cases shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the State courts. Under the present law, as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, the State court has sole jurisdiction unless the United States courts acquire jurisdiction by reason of the fact that the parties are citizens of different States.

This bill absolutely provides that a trustee, whether he be a citizen of the same State or a citizen of a different State from the party whom he proceeds against, may bring his suit in the Federal court. In this way that very material and important provision of the existing bankruptcy law, which was inserted in this House and without which it could not have passed the House, is proposed by the bill now before us to be repealed.

Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], which seeks to repeal that entire bankruptcy act, is offered in the nature of a substitute, and it is a well-known principle of parliamentary law that the opponents of a measure may offer as an amendment in the nature of a substitute a proposition which entirely changes the character of the pending bill to such an extent that even those who advocate the bill in its original form may not vote for it. I ask the attention of the Chair to a sentence which is to be found on page 736 of the Manual:

A new bill may be ingrafted by way of amendment on the words of "Be it enacted," etc.

And reference is made to Hinds's Manual, 1046, with a reference also to Mr. Jefferson's Manual, which is accepted as authority in this House unless the rules of the House expressly provide otherwise. From Jefferson's Manual, page 187, I read the following:

Amendments may be made so as totally to alter the nature of the proposition; and it is a way of getting rid of a proposition by making it bear a sense different from what it was intended by the movers, so that they vote against it themselves (2 Hats., 79; 4, 82, 84). A new bill may be ingrafted by way of amendment on the words "Be it enacted," etc. (1 Grey, 190, 192).

So that, Mr. Speaker, when we come to a proposition that substitutes one provision for another we are supported by the well-settled principle of parliamentary law that the opponents of a measure, if they have the numerical strength, may ingraft upon the enacting clause of the pending measure a substitute which entirely changes the effect of the measure.

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this substitute is germane for the reasons that I have endeavored to convey to the Chair, because it repeals the entire bankruptcy law, and the bill before us, while it does not use the words "is hereby repealed," in effect does repeal, and the words are not what make a law, exactly, but the effect that is to be had.

Mr. LANHAM. May I ask the gentleman from Georgia a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. What is the object of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. Which bill?

Mr. LANHAM. This bill that we have now before us.

Mr. BARTLETT. The object of this bill I think might well be stated to be an effort to turn the Federal courts into a collection machine for various creditors.

Mr. CLAYTON. And to increase the fees of officers.

Mr. LANHAM. That is not an answer from a parliamentary standpoint. I say, What is the object of this bill—what is the purpose of it?

Mr. BARTLETT. The purpose of this bill is to amend, add to, or take away from certain provisions of the existing bankruptcy law. I think that every one of the amendments adds to it. The gentleman from New York, who made the report——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a suggestion at this point?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. An addition to an addition or a subtraction from a subtraction is always germane.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I should think so.

I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to detain the House any longer. I desire to say that in my judgment, from the examination I have made of the parliamentary law by which we are guided, from the usage of parliamentary bodies in permitting substitutes to be offered, which, though they may have a different purpose in view than the authors of the bill intended, though they may destroy the purpose of the bill, yet we have a perfect right to offer, and I submit that this is entirely germane. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] advocates, and the committee has offered, the pending bill, entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved July 1, 1898." Now, that is the title of the bill—to amend that act. Let us examine the amendments and see if the amendment which I have read in my time and which has been offered at my suggestion by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] is not entirely germane to this bill.

The bill is to amend the bankruptcy act. It does not say and it is not restricted in substance to amendment by way of addition only. The body of the bill shows that its effect and its object is to amend the bankruptcy law in more than one respect. It amends it, Mr. Speaker, by adding new provisions to the original bankruptcy law. It amends it by subtracting from the provisions of the original bankruptcy law.

It amends it by adding to it the power of the bankruptcy court to make a man's wife a witness in a bankruptcy proceeding. That is an addition, pure and simple. It subtracts from the law which gives a man the right to a discharge in bankruptcy as often as he can make a proper showing. Under this bill that right is taken away or not allowed except once in six years. It subtracts from the right of the bankrupt and says he shall not be discharged except once in six years.

Then again, Mr. Speaker, another change in the law. Turn to section 17 of the bankruptcy law, and it reads as follows:

SEC. 17. Debts not affected by a discharge: a. A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as (1) are due as a tax levied by the United States, the State, county, district, or municipality in which he resides; (2) are judgments in actions for frauds or obtaining property, etc.

By section 6, on page 4 of the bill, this section 17 is amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 17. Debts not affected by a discharge.—a A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as (1) are due as a tax levied by the United States, the State, county, district, or municipality in which he resides; (2) are liabilities for frauds, or obtaining property, etc.

In the law the words "judgments in action" are used, and the bill amends that provision by striking out those words and inserting "liabilities." Every lawyer knows what "judgments in action" means. It is a term of well-ascertained legal meaning. It has a restricted meaning. It is not as large a term in meaning as the word "liabilities." The words "judgments in action" in the original law are stricken out and the word "liabilities" is substituted. This is one amendment.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that this bill, both directly and by implication, adds to the original act and subtracts from the original act. Now, every time you make an addition or a subtraction from a law you repeal that law pro tanto. The difference between this bill to repeal a part of the law and this amendment to repeal the whole law is not a difference of principle.

A repeal pro tanto is a repeal different from a repeal in toto in the fact that it is less in extent only. The same principle underlies both. This bill certainly, in the respects that I have named and in others, repeals pro tanto, so far as each one of those amendments is concerned, the original law. This substitute which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] has offered repeals the law in toto. There is no difference in principle.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The sections of the original law must be considered as germane to one another.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; as said by the gentleman from Mississippi, the sections of the original law must be considered as germane one to the other.

Mr. LANHAM. Will my friend allow a suggestion?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. LANHAM. My friend is a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; I have the honor to serve on that committee with the distinguished next governor of Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. I thank the gentleman. He very thoroughly understands the objects and purposes of this bill. He was present in the committee, I suppose, when those amendments were considered.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. Now, was it not utterly foreign to the purpose of the committee, in presenting these amendments, to suggest any idea of repealing the existing law on the subject?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think not. I think it was the purpose manifested in almost every line of this bill to repeal very essential parts of the original law, and that is exactly my position, that you intend by this bill to repeal essential and vital parts of the original law. I specify some of them, to wit, the right of a man to avail himself of its operation for a discharge whenever he pleases; to strike out the words "judgments in action" and substitute the word "liabilities," which is a larger word. And in other respects you intend to repeal vital and essential parts of the original law, and to add other provisions.

Mr. LANHAM. Was it not intended by the committee that the original law should stand?

Mr. CLAYTON. As amended, certainly; and your amendments go only a part of the way toward repeal. My amendment goes the whole way.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is not a question of intent.

Mr. CLAYTON. You go halfway and I go the whole way. That is the difference. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe I have said all I desire to say on this point of order.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me that the last argument adduced by the gentleman from Alabama, as applied to his colleague from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], ought to convince the Chair that this proposed amendment is not germane. It ought also to be convincing to the Chair that hereafter every time it is proposed to amend a law we should not be compelled to vote on a proposition to repeal it, but I shall be content to have the decision of the Chair, and I now ask the Chair to decide the point of order so that we may go on with business.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Speaker, the point that I want to make, and that I want the Chair to listen to, is this: The different sections of the existing bankruptcy law are, parliamentarily speaking, germane to one another. That, I take it, is a proposition which can not be disputed. Sections 2, 3, 21, and 23 of the existing bankruptcy law are germane to one another, in the contemplation of the Chair, viewing questions affecting the existing law, and must necessarily be.

Now, then, if a bill is brought into the House modifying and repealing pro tanto or in toto a single one of the sections of the existing bankruptcy law, and if an amendment were offered to the amendment (because the new bill is in the nature of an amendment to the existing law), going a bit further or stopping a bit short, or modifying the amendment of a section of existing law by restricting the meaning of the amendment, or going a bit further and adding to it by still further restricting the operation of existing law by amending or repealing the next section in the bankruptcy law, the Chair would undoubtedly rule that that amendment to the bill would be germane. For example, if this bill repeals section 2 of the existing bankruptcy law, and an amendment were offered to it likewise to repeal section 3, I take it there would be no dispute.

Now, then, if that be true, why can not there be added to section 3, section 4, section 5, section 10, or sections 20 or 25, or all the sections of existing laws clear out to the end of the bill? Or, in other words, when a bill is offered in the shape of an amendment to existing law, the effect of which bill is to repeal in toto a single section of the existing law, or to repeal pro tanto a part of a single section of the existing law, why is not the offering of an amendment to that amendment (regarding this bill as an amendment) a complete repeal pro tanto of a given section or a repeal in toto of a given section germane? And why is not an amendment to that amendment to continue the repeal of the existing law which has taken the shape of repealing in toto one section of the existing law to another section germane? And if germane that far, why not germane clear on through to the end of the bill, or, rather, to the end of the repeal of existing law?

Mr. BARTLETT. Let me make a suggestion to my friend. Is it not a fact that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri is virtually a limitation of time as to the existing bankruptcy law as it now exists or as it may be amended to-day?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think so.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, if it were germane to the bankruptcy bill, the original limit of time which was to exist as was done in 1800, why is it not germane to amend by limiting the time in this instance?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think it is; especially as this bill itself changes certain limitations of time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill before the House is a bill "to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved July 1, 1898." To that bill the gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which the Chair will ask the Clerk to report again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"That the act approved July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' be, and the same is, hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein shall in any way affect proceedings under said act begun prior to the taking effect of this act, and this act shall take effect ninety days after the approval thereof."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To this proposed amendment the point is made that it is not germane.

It is apparent from even a casual examination of the bill that it is a general amendatory bill. Section 1 relates to clause 15 of section 1 of the existing bankruptcy law; section 2 relates to clause 5 of section 2 of the existing bankruptcy law; section 3 relates to clause 4 of subdivision A of section 3 of the bankruptcy law; section 6 relates to section 17, and section 10 relates to section 40, and so on, skipping from section to section throughout the entire law, without regard to the particular relation of these sections to each other. In other words, 16 sections in all of the 70 sections of the bankruptcy law are here sought to be amended, or more than one-fourth of the entire law.

While the Chair has been unable to find any precedents on this question, it has deduced some general principles from former decisions that throw some light upon it. In the Fifty-first Congress it was held that to a bill amending a general law on a specific point an amendment relating to the terms of the law rather than to those of the bill was not germane. The bill in question was an amendment to a general land-forfeiture bill fixing the time when the original act should take effect, and the amendment offered was an amendment providing for the method of classification of the lands described in the original act, so as to determine the character of the land selected by the railroad. The decision, which was made by Speaker Reed, was upon the ground that the bill related only to one certain specific point and did not involve the general features of the bill sought to be amended.

Substantially the same principle was recognized by Speaker HENDERSON in a case where amendments were offered of a general character to the Senate joint resolution providing for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of the civil officers provided for in the act approved April 24, 1900. The same distinction was there drawn between the germaneness of an amendment which was offered to a bill having a single purpose and an amendment to a bill covering several purposes or one general subject. On the other hand, but illustrating the same general principle, recently in the discussion on the omnibus statehood bill it was held by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, that an amendment offered to include the Indian Territory was germane, because the pending bill related not to one particular Territory but was a general statehood bill, including Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona.

Had the bill been to admit a State the amendment would not have been in order, but it being a bill to admit States the subject of admission generally made the amendment competent. In the light of the principles thus announced, the Chair is inclined to think that any amendment that would be germane to the law sought to be amended would be germane to the pending bill.

It needs no argument to show that it would be competent to amend the pending bill, disposing of it section by section. For example, section 1 may be amended by striking out the words "amended so as to read as follows" and by substituting the word "repealed;" so that the section would read: "That clause 15 of section 1 of an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved July 1, 1898, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

The same method may be followed in the case of each and all of the sections of the bill in their order. And this process, in the opinion of the Chair, may be made to reach to other paragraphs of the bankruptcy law than those specifically referred to in the pending amendatory bill, because all the sections of the bankruptcy law are germane to each other.

For example, it would be in order to amend the bill by adding additional sections amendatory of sections of the bankruptcy law not referred to in the bill.

If this be so, then it would be equally in order to amend the bill by adding additional sections repealing sections of the bankruptcy law not referred to in this bill. If this process of reasoning be correct, then it is clear that by resort to the method suggested the entire bankruptcy law may be repealed by indirection. As it is, one of the purposes of parliamentary rules is to provide for the most direct method of disposing of legislation, and as by the process described the effect intended by this amendment can be reached, the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment must be germane, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment and to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have four minutes remaining of time that was unused, and which I reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is right; but he can not take another gentleman off the floor. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether his amendment has been offered or merely was read for information?

Mr. BARTLETT. I had the amendment read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Insert after line 10, page 5:

"Provided, That no person who has been adjudged a bankrupt upon his own petition shall be discharged from any of his debts until he shall have turned over to the proper officer, for the benefit of his creditors, all property that may be allowed him under the laws of any State or Territory in excess of $2,000 in value."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, it is exceedingly difficult under our peculiar system of government to have a general bankruptcy law that will operate with perfect equality and fairness throughout the country. There are 45 different systems of collection laws, and a national bankrupt law should fit into the local collection laws as far as possible. In view of the incongruities among the various collection systems throughout the country, it is exceedingly difficult, if not absolutely impossible, to have a general bankrupt law that will operate with that degree of fairness and uniformity that is necessary to make it a complete and permanent success.

In relation to exemptions under the bankrupt law as it exists now the bankrupt can withhold from his creditors of the property he is entitled to under the local exemption laws and still be discharged from his debts. In the State of Pennsylvania the debtor is only entitled to $300 exempt from execution. In Indiana it is $600. In North Dakota it is $6,500. In Iowa, Kansas, and in a number of other States there is absolutely no limitation upon exemptions in point of value. I was talking with my friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] not an hour ago, and he stated an instance in the State of Iowa where a man on his own petition went into bankruptcy and obtained a discharge and held a homestead free and safe from his creditors which was worth $250,000 at least.

Now, this disparity of favor ought not to exist, and the amendment I propose simply provides that the debtor who goes into a bankrupt court on his own petition shall not receive a discharge from his debts until he has surrendered all of the property that the State exemption law gives him in excess of $2,000 in value. The philosophy of large and liberal exemptions is that the debtor holds the property given him exempt from sale or execution as a sort of a trust fund; that it constitutes a working capital stock which may be used by the debtor to earn means with which to pay off his debts. It is, in a sense, a trust fund held by the bankrupt for the benefit of the creditors. The present law allows him to keep this trust fund absolutely and discharges him from his debts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In some States—for instance, Alabama—the debtor is allowed to waive this exemption. Now, under this amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, if the debtor should waive all his exemption to his creditors, would he not still be allowed to retain a thousand dollars?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This amendment simply limits the amount that may be claimed under the State law. The bankrupt can not claim more than the State law gives him; but the provision is that he shall not be discharged from his debts if he keeps more than $2,000 worth of property under the terms of any State law. That is the only effect of the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. If I understand the gentleman's proposition, it is to repeal the State law in so far as it allows an exemption to a debtor of $2,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; and it is limited to petitions in voluntary bankruptcy.

Mr. TAWNEY. It would in effect repeal any such provision of the State law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you not deprive the bankrupt of the benefit of the laws of his State, provided those laws give him as an exemption of more than $2,000 worth of property?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The amendment does that. But it gives him the option of taking his discharge and giving up everything except $2,000 or of availing himself of the munificent provision of the exemption laws of some of the States and foregoing his discharge. He can not be relieved of his debts and hold a fortune under exemption laws at the same time. He can not have his discharge and keep the fund that has been allowed to remain in his hands on the theory that it is a trust fund to be used for the purpose of accumulating other property with which to pay off his indebtedness.

Mr. TAWNEY. Allow me one more question. Suppose that a little merchant in one of the smaller towns or cities is allowed under State law as an exemption his homestead, valued, we will say, at $3,000. You propose by this amendment to take that homestead away from him, to dispose of it, and turn the $1,000 over for the benefit of his creditors, and allow him to retain the $2,000 in cash?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We do not. We simply say to him, "If you keep the $3,000 that the State law gives you, you can not have a discharge upon your own voluntary petition." It does not operate where the proceeding is compulsory. But the bankrupt can not have a discharge upon his own petition if he holds more than $2,000 from his creditors, many of whom may not be worth half that much.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have occupied more time than I had intended. I think my amendment ought to prevail. It is in the interest of uniformity, justice, and equality. There is no reason in justice why a debtor should be compelled to turn over all but $300 in Pennsylvania in order to secure a discharge from his debts and a debtor in Iowa be allowed a quarter of a million and go free of his obligations.

Mr. RAY of New York. I yield ten minutes of my remaining time to my colleague from Massachusetts——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What becomes of our amendments? When will they be voted upon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They can be voted on at once.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suggest that the amendments be held up until we get through with the debate.

Mr. RAY of New York. I understood that the amendments were simply to be offered as we went along, without being voted on; and I had thirty minutes of my time remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no gentleman desires to address himself to the pending amendment, the Chair will put the question now.

Mr. LANHAM. When are we to vote on the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that the bill must first be perfected before we can vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. The Clerk will again report the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

The amendment was again read.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to be heard for a moment on that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I think this amendment should not be adopted. I believe that it is exclusively a matter for the States to determine what the exemption of the citizens should be; and that matter having been determined in each State according to the judgment of the law-making power, and apparently to the satisfaction of the people living there, the same exemption law ought to apply, I think, in the administration of the bankruptcy law. I think the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Speaker, if I interpret aright the sentiment of the people of our Union on the subject of the bankrupt law, there is no clamor for its repeal, but a strong desire on the part of the people that it should be improved and simplified.

There is no provision in the Constitution that has engendered and fostered commercial and social intercourse among the people of the several States more than that giving to Congress the right to regulate commerce among the several States, and the next provision in the powers of Congress following the regulation of commerce is that giving to Congress the right to pass a uniform system of bankruptcy. This power was essentially a necessary sequence in order to protect equally and equitably the commerce that would follow.

At first the commerce between the original thirteen States was small and confined to a few towns on the seaboard which interchanged as the centers of commerce their products with like towns in other States. But this commerce has grown, and from an inconsiderable beginning the internal commerce of the country has increased to something like 20,000,000 carloads, consisting of country produce, manufactured articles, coal, iron, and other merchandise. The farmer and trucker that sends his produce into another State, the merchant that deals in merchandise, the manufacturer that makes the products of his mills are alike interested in knowing that when they have sold their property that they will get a return of money at the price at which their articles are sold, and if, perchance, there be a failure that no person will have a preference in the settlement of the debtor's estate over them, but that they will have an equitable, pro rata division of the assets. If the insolvent laws of the various States of the Union were the same, there would be no necessity for a bankrupt law, unless it be for the release of an insolvent debtor.

In the Union to-day the States of Arkansas, Georgia, Illinois, Maryland, Mississippi, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, Texas, and Louisiana permit a failing debtor to prefer a creditor, while all the other States prohibit preferences. A farmer in the country, situate remote from a town, frequently, as I know in an experience of a number of years at the bar, has been awakened out of a state of imaginary security to find that his money, loaned to a person at a distance, is in jeopardy. The person has made an assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors. Some home creditor is preferred, and his debt, equally as honest, made a general or unpreferred claim. And in 90 per cent of the instances the preferred debt absorbs the assets, and there is nothing left for the unpreferred claim. Now, in equality there is equity, and I fail to see any difference whatever from a moral standpoint between honest debts due to a creditor, whether they be for money borrowed or property purchased.

The retention of the present law therefore makes uniformity in the laws for the distribution of the estates of insolvent debtors, and effects a just and equitable settlement of said estates. It compels fairness where frequently a debtor has a disposition to be unfair. Another reason that I favor the retention of the bankrupt law is that I believe that the existence has a deterrent effect on fraudulent failures. As is well known to those who have been engaged in the practice of the law, litigation resulting over failures has discovered or uncovered a large per cent of fraudulent transactions. When the present bankrupt law was first being discussed, in 1896, the failures in the United States were 1.31 per cent of the number of business concerns. It failed to pass. Again agitated in 1897, the failures became 1.26 per cent; in 1898, 1.10 per cent, and just as soon as the law became effective immediately the failures dropped to 0.81 per cent, where it practically continues up to the present time.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] that the administration of the bankrupt law is more expensive than the administration of the State law of assignments. After a very considerable experience in observing the comparative operation of both laws, I assert that the administration of an estate of any considerable size is much more economical under the bankrupt law. Under the State laws the commission allowed a trustee is generally 5 per cent on receipts and disbursements, while under the bankrupt law the trustee is allowed 3 per cent on amounts up to $5,000, 2½ per cent up to $10,000, and 1 per cent on amounts of $10,000 or over.

So the administration is beneficial not only to the creditor, but to the unfortunate debtor, who is the person primarily to be benefited by it.

I hope, therefore, that the law will not be repealed until the country can be heard from and it is made clear and unmistakable that its repeal is demanded.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. CRUMPACKER was rejected.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by adding after the word "services," in line 10, page 2, the following:

"In all applications for the appointment of receivers to take charge of the property of a bankrupt, the party applying for such receiver, before such receiver is appointed, shall be required to execute a bond, with good and sufficient security, to be approved by the clerk, and file the same with the clerk of the court, obligating himself to pay to the party proceeded against all costs and damages which may accrue by reason of the appointment of such receiver in the event it shall be finally determined that such receiver should not have been appointed: Provided, That no receiver shall be appointed to take charge of the assets of an alleged bankrupt until notice has been given for at least ten days of the application for such receiver to the alleged bankrupt, and until a hearing shall have been had upon such application.

"And provided further, That receivers appointed to take charge of and administer property in cases of bankruptcy shall be paid no greater fees as compensation than the following, exclusive of the necessary expenses that may be allowed by the courts, to-wit: As full compensation for their services, $100, and from the assets which may have been administered by them, where the sums received and paid out by them do not exceed $5,000, 5 per cent of such sums; and where the sums received and paid out by them exceed $5,000, 3 per cent of such sums: and no other or greater fees or allowances shall be paid or allowed such receivers for any service whatever."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, to a permanent system of bankruptcy I am opposed. I do not believe we should have a permanent system that provides for either voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy, or for both. I do not believe we should have a permanent system of bankruptcy which permits the debtor to be discharged from his debts or one embracing the features of involuntary bankruptcy which allows the creditors of the country to use the courts of the United States as a collecting machine to oppress unfortunate debtors and to harass them through such machinery. I am opposed to a permanent system of voluntary bankruptcy, because I believe that contracts should be kept and that the Government should not hold out to the citizen any inducement to engage in business or to undertake obligations which he knows if they are not met by him may be paid by a certificate of discharge in bankruptcy.

Frugality, industry, and honesty should be encouraged by the law, and while I believe that there have occurred periods in our history which fully justify the enactment of bankruptcy laws authorizing unfortunate and honest debtors to surrender their property and be discharged from their debts that they may be put upon their feet again and become good and serviceable citizens, yet when such occasions have passed and opportunities have been given for the relief of honest and unfortunate debtors, the reason for the law having ceased, the law should no longer exist.

The State courts are ample for the protection of creditors in the collection of debts. The framers of the Constitution did not intend that the United States courts should be open to every creditor, regardless of citizenship, to collect his debts by harsh and quasi criminal methods. The increased cost and expense of suits and proceedings in the United States courts over those in the State courts are and always have been so great and so expensive that in the history of our country no permanent system of bankruptcy has been permitted to endure. The present system is no exception to the rule, and therefore I am opposed to the one we have at present, as I was opposed to the system which was enacted in 1867, and which for seven years was administered.

The result of the investigation of the administration of the two systems will convince any fair-minded man that both were operated not for the purpose of collecting the debts of the creditors and relieving the honest and unfortunate debtor from his financial distress, but that the result of the administration of the system has operated to benefit only the officers of the Federal courts, registers, assignees, receivers, etc., and that the effects of the debtor have found their way chiefly, not to the creditor to whom they were due, but to the pockets of these officers, and therefore the repeal of the bankruptcy law of 1867 was demanded and had. The present system is following fast in the footsteps of the former, and while the demand for its repeal may not be presently heeded, I have no doubt but the abuses which admittedly exist in its administration will soon lead the people to also demand its removal from the statute book.

I desire briefly to call attention to the history of some bankruptcy legislation.

The bankruptcy laws of England, when first enacted, contained no feature of voluntary bankruptcy. We find that as early as in the reign of Edward I, in 1305, laws were passed in England offering special remedies to merchants against debtors, and in 1542, during the reign of Henry VIII, the bankruptcy procedure was introduced. Lord Coke speaks about the bankruptcy law as having been of foreign origin, introduced into England for the purpose of aiding in the collection of debts. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth a provision was introduced so that only merchants and traders could become bankrupt.

In 1705, during the reign of Queen Anne, provision was made for the first time for the discharge of bankrupts upon their appearing and answering all questions truthfully. This was the beginning of the feature which relieved the bankrupt from his debts. In 1825, during the reign of George IV, the voluntary feature was introduced, and from that time on bankruptcy was to be equally at the service of the debtor and the creditor. It became a method by which the poor but honest debtor might receive relief from his debts, even against the wishes of his creditor.

In 1861 the distinction between debtors and those who were traders and those who were not was done away with, and relief was given to any debtor who would deliver up his goods to his creditor in the bankruptcy proceeding, so that to-day the English bankruptcy law is applicable to all persons, and to discharge every debt may be procured in a voluntary as well as an involuntary proceeding.

Mr. Madison, in the Federalist, declared that a system of national bankruptcy was both proper and expedient, the theory of the bankruptcy law being that whenever an unfortunate debtor is unable to pay his debts in full it is not just that one or a few of his creditors should be paid in full and others receive nothing, but that his estate should be divided ratably amongst them, and that if the debtor is unfortunate, and honestly so, and delivers all to his creditors, it is only proper that he should be permitted to begin life anew freed from his old debts.

This is done, not with any disregard for contract debts, which are held sacred by the Constitution, but it is justified on the theory that every member of society is needed, and that if the person who is at the mercy of the creditor, weighed down with debt, is freed from his burden he may retrieve his reputation and become a valuable member of society, whereas if his earnings and acquisitions are always to be the prey of the voracious creditor he will not be disposed to work and acquire properly the earnings.

The various States have passed and have in force laws upon the subject of insolvency and insolvent debtors; but since the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States made in the case of Sturgiss v. Crowninshield (4 Wheaton, 143), no State can relieve the debtor of his debt, even after he has delivered up all of his property.

The first bankruptcy law which we had in this country was passed in 1800. It contained a provision for involuntary bankruptcy only, and continued in force for only two years. The next law was passed on August 12, 1840, following the panic of 1837. That panic, as is well known, was caused by the contraction of the currency, forced by the action of the United States Bank in calling in its loans to retaliate upon the people for the action of President Jackson, who had throttled and strangled that great money monopoly by refusing to approve the bill to recharter it, and by removing the deposits. This law contained both a voluntary and an involuntary feature, but it became so unpopular, raised so much opposition and indignation at the hands of the people, that it was repealed on March 3, 1843, by the same Congress that enacted it.

It has been suggested by some that a bankruptcy bill which did not contain both the voluntary and involuntary features would not comply with the provisions of the Constitution which permit Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy. An investigation of this subject will show that when the act of 1840 was introduced, and afterwards passed, an effort was made to pass a law which contained only a provision for voluntary bankruptcy, and we find the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Webster; Mr. Clay, of Kentucky; Mr. Crittenden, from Kentucky; Mr. Calhoun, from South Carolina, and other great statesmen supporting a proposition which provided only for voluntary bankruptcy.

On the 18th of May, 1840, Mr. Webster addressed the Senate upon the bankruptcy bill, a bill having been introduced establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy; and this bill and other bills upon the subject having been referred to the Judiciary Committee, that committee reported to the Senate a bill which provided for voluntary bankruptcy only. It contained no provisions by which creditors on an alleged act of bankruptcy might proceed against their debtors with a view to subject them and their property to the operation of the law. It did not look to the coercion by the creditor of his debtor into involuntary bankruptcy.

This was the first time that this characteristic of a bill on the subject of bankruptcy had been introduced which contained only a voluntary feature, and in that respect it differed from the former bankrupt laws of the United States and from the English bankrupt laws. The bill as it came from the committee provided for voluntary bankruptcy only. It was supported by Mr. Webster, and he, in his speech on the 18th of May, discussed distinctly the proposition: Can Congress pass a law providing for voluntary cases only; that is, cases in which the proceedings originate only with the debtor himself? On this subject he declared:

> The bill which has been reported by the committee provides for voluntary bankruptcies only. It contains no provisions by which creditors on an alleged act of bankruptcy may proceed against their debtors with a view to subject them and their property to the operation of the law. It looks to no coercion by a creditor to make his debtor a subject of the law against his will. This is the first characteristic of the bill, and in this respect it certainly differs from the former bankrupt laws of the United States and from the English bankrupt laws.
> The bill, too, extends its provisions not only to those who, either in fact or in contemplation of law, are traders, but to all persons who declare themselves insolvent or unable to pay their debts and meet their engagements, and who desire to assign their property for the benefit of their creditors. In this respect, also, it differs from the former law and from the law of England.
> The questions, then, are two:
> First. Can Congress constitutionally pass a bankrupt law which shall include other persons than traders?
> Second. Can it pass a law providing for voluntary cases only—that is, cases in which the proceedings originate only with the debtor himself?
> But now, sir, I come to a very important inquiry. The Constitution requires us to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, if we establish any. What is this uniformity, or in what is it to consist? The honorable gentleman says that the meaning is that the law must give a coercive power to creditors, as well as a voluntary power to debtors; that this is the constitutional uniformity. I deny this altogether. No idea of uniformity arises from any such consideration. The uniformity which the Constitution requires is merely a uniformity throughout all the States. It is a local uniformity, and nothing more. The words are perfectly plain, and the sense can not be doubted.
> The authority is to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. Can anything be clearer? To be uniform is to have one shape, one fashion, one form; and our bankrupt laws, if we pass them, are to have one shape, one fashion, and one form in every State. If this be not so, what is the sense of the concluding words of the clause, "throughout the United States?" My honorable friend from Kentucky, Mr. Crittenden, has disposed of this whole question, if there ever could be a question about it, by asking the honorable gentleman from New Jersey what "uniform" means in the very same clause of the Constitution where the word is applied to rules of naturalization; and what it means in a previous clause where it declares that "all duties of impost shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Again, on the 5th of June, 1840 (Congressional Globe, vol. 8, p. 444), Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, made a motion to strike out the involuntary part of the bankruptcy bill. This motion was supported by Mr. Webster, both in argument upon the floor of the Senate and by his vote upon the subject of the constitutionality as well as the justice and propriety of a bill which provided only for voluntary bankruptcy. In advocating the amendment offered by Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster said:

> It seems to be agreed by all the friends of any bankrupt bill that there shall be a provision for voluntary bankruptcy. The question now is whether there ought to be also a compulsory power or a power on the part of creditors to subject their debtors in certain cases to the operation of the law.
> It is well known that the bill introduced by me contained such a power, and I should still prefer to retain it. But I do not think this of so much importance as some other gentlemen, and I should cheerfully support a bill which did not contain it if by so doing I could contribute to the success of the general measure. In truth, on this question and on many others my vote will be governed by a desire to make the bill acceptable to others.
> Now, sir, the argument for the compulsory clause is that without this power the creditors have no security; that the bill is a one-sided measure, a measure for the benefit and relief of debtors only, quite regardless of the just rights of creditors. All this I deny. I maintain, on the contrary, not only that there is just security for the rights of creditors under the voluntary part of the bill, but that that part of itself and by itself is of the highest value and importance to creditors. This proposition takes for granted what I have no doubt will be found true, that persons in insolvent circumstances will generally become voluntary bankrupts; and, in the second place, I maintain that very little value is added to the security of creditors by the compulsory part of the bill. These are points on which I propose now particularly to address the Senate, and, with its patience, I hope to make them clear.
> The immediate motion before the Senate, Mr. President, does not justify a further extension of my observations on this part of the case. My object has been to prove that this bill is not one-sided, is not a bill for debtors only, but is what it ought to be, a bill making just, honest, and reasonable provisions for the distribution of the effects of insolvents among their creditors; and that the voluntary part of the bill alone secures all these principal objects, because, in the great and overruling motive of obtaining a discharge, it holds out an inducement to debtors who know themselves to be insolvent to stop, to stop seasonably, to assign honestly, and to conform in good faith to all the provisions intended for the security of their creditors.

From 1843 until 1867 we had no law upon the subject of bankruptcy. In 1867 a bankruptcy law was passed to meet the conditions that followed the destruction of property occasioned by the war of 1861 and to relieve distressed debtors who had been financially overwhelmed by the results of the war. I know something of the administration of that law. I know the records of the bankruptcy courts show that under this law as it was administered the estates of bankrupts were wasted; that both creditor and debtor were robbed by means of exorbitant fees of registers in bankruptcy and court costs and by the wasting the estate in expenses.

I know that men in my own State grew rich upon the fat fees and plunder that they filched out of the estates of bankrupts under that law. I can not, therefore, in the face of the history of the administration of these former laws and the manner in which they have been enforced and the demand of the people which has always followed for their repeal, vote to longer continue a measure having for its main purpose, not the relief of unfortunate debtors, but the enforcement of the claims of the creditors against the debtors, and that, too, by new and harsh methods, which absolutely places the small retail merchant at the mercy of his wholesale merchant creditor; nor can I give my consent to the various amendments proposed in this bill which have for their purpose the giving to the creditor additional remedies to oppress the unfortunate debtor and to defeat the purpose of the bankruptcy law to relieve the unfortunate class of our citizens who may become overwhelmed by debt.

I have not the time to discuss in detail the amendments proposed. If the law is to remain permanently on the statute book, then I think it wise that we should amend it, but not on the line on which most of the amendments contained in this bill proceed.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] has forcibly called the attention of the House to the harshness and severity of some of the amendments. I desire to call attention to some of them.

I agree with the committee and the chairman in his report that the amendment contained in section 12 of the bill is very important and should be adopted. I can not conceive how it should be either the law or that it is just that where a debtor makes payments in good faith, in due course of trade and business, to his creditor, without any knowledge on the part of the creditor that such debtor is insolvent, that such bona fide transactions should, after the insolvency, if it occurs within four months after such bona fide payment, be held to be a preference and that the creditor should surrender such payment before he can prove his debt in bankruptcy for the balance of his claim.

I do not believe that such was intended by the framers of the law, and I am convinced that it is an injustice to the creditor and to the debtor and that this defect in the law should be remedied. I am aware that the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Piere v. Chicago Title and Trust Company (182 U. S., 438), decided that such payments made in good faith by a debtor, insolvent at the time, to a creditor who was not aware of such insolvency, was a preference. In view of that decision, I am willing to remedy it by a change of the law, as proposed by the committee, if the bankruptcy law is to continue in force.

I am earnestly opposed to the change in the general policy of the law, as proposed in section 8 of this bill, which is as follows:

A court of bankruptcy may, upon application of any officer, bankrupt, or creditor, by order require any designated person, including the bankrupt and his wife, to appear in court or before a referee of the judge of any State court to be examined concerning the acts, conduct, or property of a bankrupt whose estate is in process of administration under this act.

I oppose this amendment because it proposes to drag the wife of the bankrupt before the court and subject her to an examination, not as a witness, but as a party. Such examination of the wife and the compelling her to appear as a witness against her husband in proceedings that may subject him to punishment by the court, which may result in denying him his discharge, which proposes to break down and destroy that confidential relationship which should always exist between the husband and the wife, and which has been recognized by the law always as sacred, would contravene all the principles of law upon this subject and override that public policy uniformly adopted and upheld by the courts which forbids confidential communications between husband and wife to be divulged in court.

So particular have the courts been about this that these communications between husband and wife have been held so sacred and inviolable that neither death nor divorce can destroy it. The rapacity of the creditor goes far indeed when it demands such changes in the universal law. Some of the law writers have said that this rule has been so universal and uniform that no one would ever propose to abolish it. The uniform rule is that such evidence is excluded because it contravenes sound public policy.

On this subject see 1 Greenleaf, sections 333, 346, and 354.

While courts have sometimes differed, the better opinion is as I have stated. (1 Greenleaf, sec. 345; 2 Taylor on Evidence, sec. 909, 909a, p. 590; id., p. 621, and American notes.)

I abstract from Greenleaf and Taylor the following well-settled and accepted principles of law on this subject:

Communications between husband and wife belong to this privileged class of communications, and are therefore protected independently of the ground of interest and identity, which precludes the parties from testifying for or against each other.

The happiness of the married state requires that there should be the most unlimited confidence between husband and wife; and this confidence the law secures by providing that it shall be kept forever inviolable; that nothing shall be extracted from the bosom of the wife which was confided there by the husband. (1 Greenleaf, sec. 254.)

The law excludes or dispenses with some kinds of evidence, on the ground of public policy, because it is thought that mischiefs would more probably result from requiring or permitting their admission than from wholly excluding them.

The first class of subjects protected from disclosure consists of communications between husband and wife. * * * This rests on the obvious ground that the admission of such testimony would have a powerful tendency to disturb the peace of families, to promote domestic broils, and to weaken, if not to destroy, that feeling of mutual confidence which is the most endearing solace of married life. (2 Taylor on Evidence, sec. 908, p. 589.)

This proposed amendment to the bankruptcy law utterly contravenes this well-settled doctrine of public policy, and will have the effect that it will visit upon the head of the wife of the unfortunate debtor the shame and mortification of being dragged before the United States bankruptcy courts and made to disclose these confidential communications between her and her husband, which, under the wise policy of the law, have heretofore been held sacred and inviolable. Not only does this bill and the system proposed to be perpetuated under it seek to bring shame and contumely upon the unfortunate husband, but also to disgrace the wife. Against such a monstrous proposition I enter my most earnest protest.

For the enunciation of the American doctrine on this subject see 2 Taylor on Evidence, p. 622 et seq.; Castello v. Castello, 41 Georgia, 187.

I now offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by adding after the word "services," in line 10, page 2, the following:

"In all applications for the appointment of receivers to take charge of the property of a bankrupt the party applying for such receiver, before such receiver is appointed, shall be required to execute a bond, with good and sufficient security, to be approved by the clerk, and file the same with the clerk of the court, obligating himself to pay to the party proceeded against all costs and damages which may accrue by reason of the appointment of such receiver in the event it shall be finally determined that such receiver should not have been appointed: Provided, That no receiver shall be appointed to take charge of the assets of an alleged bankrupt until notice has been given for at least ten days of the application for such receiver to the alleged bankrupt, and until a hearing shall have been had upon such application.

"And provided further, That receivers appointed to take charge of and administer property in cases of bankruptcy shall be paid no greater fees as compensation than the following, exclusive of the necessary expenses that may be allowed by the courts, to wit: As full compensation for their services, $100, and from the assets which may have been administered by them, where the sums received and paid out by them do not exceed $5,000, 5 per cent of such sums; and where the sums received and paid out by them exceed $5,000, 3 per cent of such sums; and no other or greater fees or allowances shall be paid or allowed such receivers for any service whatever."

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] has called attention to the fact that the expenses and commissions paid under this system, as shown by the report of the Attorney-General, have amounted to from 45 to 46 per cent of the amount of the estates distributed in dividends. He compiled and submitted the following statement in support of his assertion, which, with his permission, I insert:

	1899.	1900.	1901.	Total.
ASSETS.
Involuntary cases..	$11,701,713.43	$13,433,209.45	$2,534,266.79	$105,906,716.63

Voluntary cases	355,949,336.48	264,979,152.45	162,635,658.22

I desire to call attention to the fact that in different States of the Union and in different districts of the same State there is a great variance in the expenses, commissions, etc., paid out by the court for the same kind, amount, and class of services. An examination of the report of the Attorney-General for 1901, to be found on pages 394 to 401, inclusive, will demonstrate this.

I submit the following statement, in parallel columns, showing the expense of administering the present system of bankruptcy in the States of Kentucky and Massachusetts. I place them in parallel columns that the vast difference in the expenditures in the courts of the two States may attract the attention of the public and that they may realize the vice of a system which permits in one court such a large amount to be paid out for expenses and in another so reasonable an amount to be paid:

Voluntary cases.

KENTUCKY.		MASSACHUSETTS.
Number of cases	394	Number of cases	1,250
Dividends	$57,785.99	Dividends	$302,278.20
Set apart	62,555.00	Exemptions	135,182.00
Priorities	88,663.00	Priorities	376,605.00
Expenses	67,355.51	Expenses	51,827.48

Involuntary cases.

Number of cases	22	Number of cases	40
Assets	$309,633.84	Assets	$119,895.01
Dividends	10,432.97	Dividends	57,224.41
Exemptions	8,075.00	Exemptions	1,915.00
Priorities	11,300.00	Priorities	50,074.00
Expenses	83,179.98	Expenses	3,060.01

In the case of Kentucky there were paid out in dividends and priorities in voluntary cases the sum of $146,448.99, and the expenses were $67,355.51.

In the case of Massachusetts there were paid out in dividends and priorities $678,883.20, and the expenses were $51,827.48.

So that it required nearly $16,000 more to pay out to creditors in Kentucky $146,448.99 than it required to pay out $678,883.20 in Massachusetts.

In the cases of involuntary bankruptcy it will be noted that for paying out in dividends and priorities the sum of $21,732.97 it required $83,179.88 in expenses.

In Massachusetts, for paying out in involuntary cases the sum of $107,298.41 it required only $3,060.01 in expenses.

Such disparity in the costs and expenses paid out by the courts in these two States is enough to alarm the public and to require either that the law should be abolished or that it should be so amended as to correct such glaring evils.

And so an examination of the report of the Attorney-General will show that this law is used in many States mainly to pay the assets of the bankrupt's estate not to the creditors, but to court costs, expenses, etc.

I call attention now to the administration of this law in the State of Georgia and to the following statement taken from that report:

Report of bankruptcy cases in the State of Georgia for the year ending September 30, 1901.

VOLUNTARY CASES.

Northern district (194 cases):		Southern district (125 cases):
Assets	$85,706.53	Assets	$76,937.91
Liabilities	1,085,573.45	Liabilities	972,938.33
Dividends	12,162.50	Dividends	658.85
Priorities	44,528.00	Priorities	8,720.00
Fees, commissions, expenses, etc	11,160.71	Fees, commissions, expenses, etc	6,497.25

INVOLUNTARY CASES.

Northern district (15 cases):		Southern district (17 cases):
Assets	$44,395.57	Assets	$37,001.67
Dividends	35,254.60	Dividends	2,556.55

Expenses	1,752.10	Expenses	2,384.55
Leaving	37,885.50	Leaving	366.00

It will be observed from this statement that in the northern district, for paying out in dividends and priorities in voluntary cases the sum of $56,690.50, the expenses were $11,160.71; while in the southern district, for paying out the sum of $9,378.86, the expenses were $6,497.25.

It will be further noted that for paying out the sum of $39,637.60 in involuntary cases in the northern district of Georgia the expenses were $1,752.10, while in the southern district of Georgia for paying out the sum of $2,750.55 in involuntary cases the expenses were $2,384.55.

The following is a statement of bankruptcy cases in the southern district of Georgia since the last report of the Attorney-General:

Voluntary cases (85):		Involuntary cases (13):
Assets	$25,391.06	Assets	$18,224.85
Dividends	724.10	Dividends	658.86
Priorities	3,631.00	Priorities	10,201.00
Expenses	4,888.03	Expenses	1,826.39

Mr. Speaker, in order to show the enormous expense to which the people of this country have been put in the administration of the bankruptcy law under the present system in some of the bankruptcy courts, I have directed the attention of the House to the report of the Attorney-General and to a statement of my own compiled from that report for 1901. The difference in the reports of the administration of this law in the States of Massachusetts and Kentucky, in the matter of the payment of fees, commissions, etc., is so wide and glaring that it is startling. The cold figures demonstrate that in the one State (Massachusetts) the administration has been economical and cheap and in the other (Kentucky) it has been extravagant and expensive.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman how he accounts for that?

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not on any other ground account for it except that there are judges who do not regard the law and who divide up the estates of debtors and creditors to receivers and officials.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who are the judges?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have here an illustration from the State of Georgia, taking the two districts, one the northern and the other the southern. The last report of the Attorney-General shows that the administration of one is economical, in the other that the fees, commissions, etc., are extravagant. In the southern district, in which I live—I beg to read from the report of the Attorney-General for 1901—that there, in cases of voluntary bankruptcy, they have paid out to creditors in dividends and to pay priorities $9,370; and in order to pay out that to the creditors the officials of the courts and the receivers and others were paid $6,497.25 for fees, commissions, and expenses.

In the very same State, amongst the same people, the same character of cases, the same character of claims, and the same kind of people to administer them, in one part of the State—in the northern district—the expenses amounted to 4⅓ per cent in involuntary cases and 16½ per cent in voluntary cases, and in the other—the southern district—they amounted to 47 per cent in cases of involuntary and 41 per cent in voluntary bankruptcy.

It is because of these abuses, it is because of the fact that very little at most is realized for creditors, and the officers of the courts, the receivers, and others who are appointed to administer the estates under this law receive for services, costs, etc., the money that should be paid to the creditor, and would be paid under the State laws and State court administration, that I have offered this amendment, with the purpose of correcting in some measure these evils and abuses.

In fact, such abuses, such extravagance in cost of administration, have been the result; such has been the experience of the people under the administration of every bankruptcy law which has remained upon the statute books for any length of time.

Mr. Speaker, I wish I had time to go into the details of this bill and the proposed amendments; but I must content myself with what I have said. This bill and the existing bankruptcy law might well be termed a law neither to aid the creditor to collect his debt nor to relieve the honest debtor from his burdens, but to aid those who make fortunes out of both. Mr. Speaker, Dickens, in his celebrated work Bleak House, called the attention of the English people to the abuses that existed in the chancery court, and I beg in conclusion to quote what he said:

> This is the court of chancery; which has its decaying houses and its blighted lands in every shire; which has its worn-out lunatic in every mad house, and its dead in every churchyard; which has its ruined suitor, with his slipshod heels and threadbare dress, borrowing and begging through the round of every man's acquaintance; which gives to moneyed might the means abundantly of wearying out the right; which so exhausts finances, patience, courage, hope; so overthrows the brain and breaks the heart that there is not an honorable man among its practitioners who would not give—who does not often give—the warning: "Suffer any wrong that can be done you rather than come here."

So I say to this House, so I say to the American debtor and the American creditor, under this system of bankruptcy which we have on our statute books and under these proposed amendments that it would be better for them to suffer any wrong rather than to go into these bankruptcy courts. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Alabama claims four minutes, and I understood the Chair to say that he still has the right to occupy that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. RAY of New York. I desire to say now in view of the lateness of the hour that I hope the gentleman will occupy his time, so that I can complete my remarks.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, in order to be perfectly frank with the House and the gentleman from New York, I understood when I took the floor that I occupied the four minutes that were credited to the gentleman from Alabama, and so governed myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under that statement the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] is recognized.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield five minutes to my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS].

[Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to present a like request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Georgia ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAY of New York. I offer an amendment suggested by my friend from Alabama.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question first is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appear to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT demanded a division.

The Committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 80.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York will now be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 72. Provided, That when the bankrupt in any State has waived his right to claim his exempt property to his creditors, the bankruptcy court shall not set apart to him this exemption as against said creditors.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is not the amendment I offered. I beg pardon; I could not hear.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to explain this amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the amendment been fully reported, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. RAY of New York. May I ask to have it read again?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Where does the gentleman want this amendment to come in the bill?

Mr. RAY of New York. The seventh section, I think.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman want the amendment to come in section 72 of the bankruptcy law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Seventy-two.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seventy-two of the bankruptcy law. Then it will be section 17, an additional section of this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY of New York. Has that amendment been read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment has been read.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I hope that amendment will be agreed to. It is just and proper. Now, I move the previous question on the bill and all the pending amendments to its final passage.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish to know the status of the amendment which I offered and had read in my time, and which was offered subsequently by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be disposed of after the text of the bill has been perfected. The Clerk will again report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new section:

"SEC. 17. That said act is also amended by adding thereto a new section, as follows:

"'SEC. 72. Provided, That where the bankrupt in any State has waived his right to claim his exempt property to his creditors the bankruptcy court shall not set apart to him this exemption as against said creditors.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RAY of New York. Have I not the right to demand the previous question on the bill and amendments? I have done so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks for the previous question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is the amendment offered subject to debate? I am opposed to the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York has the floor and has demanded the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 57.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 55.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. RAY of New York. May I have that amendment reported again?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking all out after the enacting clause and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"That the act approved July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States' be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing herein shall in any way affect proceedings under said act begun prior to the taking effect of this act, and this act shall take effect ninety days after the approval thereof."

Mr. CLAYTON. I demand the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken: and there were—yeas 66, nays 137, answering "present" 9, not voting 139; as follows:

PUNISHMENT OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7206) providing for the punishment of United States prisoners for crimes committed while confined in State penal institutions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter when any prisoner confined in any State prison or reformatory, under or by virtue of a sentence of any United States court, shall commit, or be charged with the commission of, any crime against the laws of the State in which said prison or reformatory is situated, said prisoner shall be turned over to the proper State authorities for trial, and if the sentence of the State court is either death or imprisonment for life, said prisoner shall at once be sentenced and said judgment executed. If the judgment of said State court shall be for imprisonment for a term of years said prisoner shall be remanded by the State court back to the prison or reformatory whence said prisoner was obtained, there to serve out the sentence of the United States court, after which time he shall be turned over to the State authorities in order that he may serve out the judgment of the State court.

SEC. 2. That all laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That whenever any prisoner confined in any State prison or reformatory within a State, under and by virtue of a sentence of any court of the United States to imprisonment for a term less than life, has committed or shall commit any crime against the laws of any State of the United States the punishment for which by the laws of such State is death or imprisonment in the State prison, and such prisoner has been or shall be indicted therefor, he may be turned over to the proper State authorities for trial on the requisition of the governor of such State, accompanied by satisfactory proof of the facts and designating the officer or officers to whom such surrender is desired, in case such requisition is approved and such surrender is directed by the Attorney-General of the United States; and if such prisoner is convicted in the State court, and the penalty imposed thereby is either death or imprisonment for life, he may be sentenced and the judgment executed by the State authorities. If such prisoner is acquitted, or if convicted and the penalty imposed by said State court is less than death or imprisonment for life, he shall be immediately remanded by the State court to the prison or reformatory whence obtained, there to serve out the sentence of the United States court less the diminution of time hereinafter provided, after which he shall be surrendered to the State authorities to answer the judgment of the State court.

The officers of the State having the custody of such prisoner shall deliver and surrender him at the place of his confinement to the authorities of the prison or reformatory from which he was obtained: Provided, That in no case shall a prisoner so surrendered for trial be admitted to bail by any State official, State court, or any judge or justice thereof: Provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as an absolute surrender of the custody of such prisoner by the authorities of the United States, but the actual custody of the United States may be immediately resumed and asserted whenever the purposes of this act are accomplished: Provided further, That in case a pardon shall be granted such prisoner by the authorities of either the State or of the United States in the exercise of their power and jurisdiction, then such prisoner shall be immediately subject and surrendered to the authority and proper officials of the other, as the case may be: Provided further, That no such prisoner shall be surrendered to the authorities of a State under the provisions of this act until such State has provided by law for the detention and surrender of such prisoner to the authorities of the United States in case of his acquittal, pardon, or sentence on conviction to any punishment less than death or imprisonment for life, and has also provided by law that no such prisoner so surrendered shall be admitted to bail by any court of the State or any judge or justice thereof or any other official of the State.

SEC. 2. That whenever a prisoner heretofore or hereafter convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for a crime heretofore committed is surrendered to the authorities of a State under the provisions of this act for trial under the State laws the time during which he is held in custody by the State authorities shall be deemed and shall count as part of the term of imprisonment imposed by the United States court, and the term of his actual imprisonment in such State prison or reformatory, as the case may be, shall be diminished accordingly, but any person hereafter convicted and imprisoned for the commission of any crime hereafter committed shall be held and imprisoned for the full term imposed by the court of the United States, without deduction or diminution of time on account of being surrendered to and held in custody by a State court under and pursuant to the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I assume that this bill is all right, but I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I will gladly explain the matter, and I can do so in two minutes.

While the substitute just read is quite long, it was made necessary by the conditions. A prisoner convicted under United States law is generally confined in a State prison. At present there is no method by which such a prisoner can be taken from the authorities of the United States while so confined and tried for an offense committed against the State. Now, it happened down in Kentucky that a United States prisoner serving an imprisonment for a few years in a State institution murdered his keeper.

There is no way by which he can be tried and convicted of that murder. We would have to wait eight or ten years, and then the witnesses might be dead. Now, it is proposed to have some special legislation covering such cases. I went to work and drew a bill, and submitted it to some of the best lawyers in the House, to cover such cases, which would permit the taking from these State institutions, convicted and confined under jurisdiction of the United States, a prisoner and his trial where he commits a greater offense. Such a bill needs careful provisions, you see, to prevent escape; it needs careful provisions as to confinement and return and custody and what shall be done with him after he is tried by the State and convicted or acquitted. Of course, we provide that if the punishment prescribed by the State is death, then the State takes his life. If the punishment is imprisonment for life, the State may keep him; but if it is for any less time, then we provide he shall be returned to the United States to serve out his sentence, and then the United States shall turn him over to the State. It is a very carefully prepared bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time. and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE AT EVENING SESSION.

The SPEAKER. At this stage the Chair takes occasion to state that he appoints Mr. OLMSTED, of Pennsylvania, to preside during the evening session.

COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 14892) relating to jurisdiction on appeals in the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and transcripts on appeals in said court, and to quiet title to public lands, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction on appeal from the final decision or order of the Secretary of the Interior in all cases rejecting an application for a patent to land claimed under any of the land laws of the United States is hereby given to and vested in the court of appeals of the District of Columbia. Appeal to such court shall lie whether the rejected application for patent be ex parte or whether such rejection be the final decision or order of and in the Interior Department made in a contest for a patent to land between opposing parties claiming the same land: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to give the right of appeal when a patent to the land in question has in fact issued to any party.

SEC. 2. That the transcript on appeal shall consist of the application for the patent, if ex parte, and the proof made in support of the application in the Interior Department, which transcript shall be certified to by the said Secretary of the Interior Department with the official seal thereof attached. If said appeal be taken from a final decision or order of the Interior Department rejecting an application for patent by either party in a case of contest therefor between two or more opposing parties, then the transcript shall be prepared by appellant and shall contain the appellant's application for patent, and the proof in the Interior Department in support thereof deemed necessary by appellant, which said transcript shall be printed and a copy thereof served on appellee, who, if not satisfied with said transcript so served on him by appellant, shall have the right to print and file in the appellate court, within thirty days after such service of appellant's transcript on him, or within the time fixed by the court, a supplemental transcript deemed by appellee to be necessary to fully present the case on appeal and his rights therein. No appeal shall be taken from a final decision or order of the Interior Department rejecting an application for a patent made and entered of record and promulgated more than one year prior to such appeal. When an appeal is taken in a contested case, the parties to said contest may stipulate what the record on appeal shall contain, and such stipulation shall be filed with and be a part of the record on appeal. Appeals shall not be allowed under this act from any decision made prior to January 1, 1902.

SEC. 3. That when an appeal is taken to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia as hereinbefore provided, the appellant shall give notice thereof to the Secretary of the Interior, and shall also file in the office of the clerk of said court of appeals, within thirty days, his reasons of appeal sufficiently set forth in writing.

SEC. 4. That the court shall, before hearing such appeal, give notice to the Secretary of the Interior of the time and place of the hearing, and on receiving such notice the Secretary of the Interior shall give notice of such time and place to such parties as are interested therein, and the Secretary of the Interior may, if he so elects, furnish the court with the grounds of his decision fully set forth in writing and touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal.

SEC. 5. That the court shall hear and determine such appeal and revise the decision appealed from at such early and convenient time as the court may appoint, and the revision shall be confined to the points set forth in the reasons for appeal; and the court shall also have jurisdiction on such appeal to adjudge the rights of the parties to a patent, and to apportion the costs of appeal between the parties as to the said court seems just; and after hearing and deciding the case the court shall return to the Secretary of the Interior a certificate of its proceedings and decision, which shall be entered of record in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and shall govern the further proceedings in the case. If the court, on such appeal, shall adjudge that the appellant upon the record as presented is entitled to a patent, the Secretary of the Interior shall issue such patent on the appellant filing in the office of the Secretary of the Interior a copy of the adjudication and otherwise complying with the requirements of law: Provided always, That an appeal shall lie from the court of appeals of the District of Columbia to the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 6. That any person claiming title, either legal or equitable, by compliance with any law of the United States for disposal of the public domain, to any public lands the record title of which is in the United States, which the Land Department refuses to recognize, may institute against the United States in the Court of Claims, and prosecute to final decision, any suit that may be necessary to settle the same: Provided, That no such suit shall be brought for causes now existing, where the final decision of the Land Department was made prior to January 1, 1902, at any time after the expiration of six months after the passage of this act, nor, for causes hereafter arising, after six months from the final decision of the Land Department upon such claim, and suits hereunder not brought within such time shall be forever barred.

SEC. 7. That all such suits shall be by petition in the nature of a bill in equity, and shall be conducted and determined in all respects, except as herein otherwise provided, according to the rules and principles of equity, practice, and jurisprudence in the courts of the United States; and for the purpose of this act the Court of Claims is hereby invested with the jurisdiction and powers exercised by courts of equity so far as it may be necessary to give relief in any suit which may be instituted under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That notice of every suit authorized by this act shall be executed by the delivery of a true copy thereof, with a copy of the petition, to the Attorney-General, whose duty it shall be for and in behalf of the United States to demur to or answer the petition therein within thirty days after the service of such process upon him, unless the court shall for good cause shown grant further time for filing the same.

SEC. 9. That if two or more parties claiming the same lands under different rights shall institute separate suits under the provisions of this act, such suits shall be consolidated and tried together, and the court shall determine the question of title, and grant all proper relief as between the prospective claimants as well as between each of them and the United States. If the court decide in favor of any claimant, both as against the United States and other claimants, it shall so decree, and proceed by proper process to put such successful claimant in such possession of such portion thereof as he may be thus found to be entitled to, and upon the filing of a certified copy of such decree with the Secretary of the Interior he shall cause a patent to be issued to the party in whose favor such decree shall be rendered for the lands therein adjudged to him: Provided, That either party may, within ninety days after rendition of any final judgment or decree in any suit authorized by this act, carry such suit by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, which court is hereby vested with full jurisdiction to hear and determine the same on such appeal, in the same manner and with the same effect as in cases of appeal in equity causes from the circuit courts of the United States: And provided further, That in case the judgment or decree of the Court of Claims in any such suit shall be adverse to the United States, the Attorney-General shall prosecute such appeal within the time above described; and the taking of an appeal from any such judgment or decree shall operate as a supersedeas thereof until the final hearing and judgment of the Supreme Court thereon.

The qualifications, duties, and powers, and the compensation of said constables shall be the same as that now provided by law for other constables in the Indian Territory.

SEC. 4. That all persons now residing in the western judicial district who have heretofore been appointed and commissioned notaries public in the Indian Territory, and whose terms of office have not yet expired, are hereby empowered and authorized to continue to act as such notaries public until the expiration of the term for which each was appointed.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage and approval.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think that we ought to have unanimous consent to consider that bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. While I do not think there will be any objection to this, still it does make in a way a charge on the Treasury, because it creates these new officers in the Indian Territory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the special order allows the gentleman to bring it up in the House.

Mr. RAY of New York. Very well. All I desire to say to the House is that this matter was submitted to a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, of which Mr. WARNER, of Illinois, was chairman. Careful consideration was given to the necessity of these officers. The subcommittee made investigations and were satisfied that these new additional officers should be given. Every member of the committee was of that opinion. The report was unanimous.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. RAY of New York. I yield.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. RAY of New York. I yield to my colleague [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. I simply want to add to the statement made by the gentleman from New York the further statement that I have had several letters from different people—business men, merchants, and lawyers in the Indian Territory—saying that the passage of this measure is essential and in the interest of public justice. I indorse the statement of the gentleman that this measure has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAY of New York. Whatever time the gentleman needs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] is recognized.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that frequent requests for the passage of a bill of this kind have come to various members of the Committee on Indian Affairs; but as that committee has no jurisdiction of the question, of course it could not take any action. The necessity for the bill, however, is very evident.

Mr. RAY of New York. You do not question the necessity?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, no; I have no doubt of it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly; five minutes, or such time as the gentleman desires.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I shall not interpose any objection to the passage of this bill, because any legislation for these benighted people of the Indian Territory is like a breath of fresh air in a charnel house. I ask this opportunity to present to the House again the state of anarchy that prevails in the Indian Territory. One hundred thousand school children there are neglected by Congress in our failure to pass some law providing for their education. At present there is an absence of all law on the subject outside of towns.

The insane of the Indian Territory are transported to the asylum across the Potomac River here because there is no law providing for their care or for the security of the people who might be injured by reason of their violence.

Only three days ago a representative of the Indian Territory in the city of Washington was asked by the authorities there to consult the various departments of the United States Government to see if some means could be provided for the care of a violent insane man. The result of the inquiry and effort was that no law could be found to cover the case, and he was advised by the very authorities who should provide or recommend legislation that the insane man had better be shipped to some sister State and there be cared for. Twenty-five of those insane from the Indian Territory are to-day at St. Elizabeth's, the only place where they can be cared for and protected.

Three hundred thousand people of the Indian Territory have no law for their government to-day. No law for schools, for institutions, for highways and bridges. Congress has denied to these people the legislation necessary for their proper government. I only desire to emphasize this fact, thinking that perhaps at some time we may secure the remedy which has been so long desired by these people and legislation that American citizens surely deserve.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York will yield for a moment, I desire to ask him a question. If I remember correctly, constables in the Indian Territory have no power to appoint deputies. That being true, I would suggest whether it would not be wise to give them the power to appoint at least one deputy with the approval of the judge.

Mr. RAY of New York. It would not be wise to do that here without consideration. If that is a matter of wisdom and the gentleman will present it to the Judiciary Committee, we will consider it carefully, but to do such a thing here in the haste of legislation would be unwise.

Mr. LANHAM. It can be considered in the Senate on an amendment.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; as my colleague suggests, it can be offered as an amendment to the bill in the Senate.

Mr. LITTLE. I have no objection to the pending bill. I have no doubt it ought to be passed, but there ought to be some other provisions.

Mr. RAY of New York. Such matters ought not to be acted on hastily without consideration in the committee.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SUPPRESSION OF TRAIN ROBBERIES.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call up House bill 11412, for the suppression of train robberies in the Territories of the United States and other places, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who within any State or Territory of the United States, or other place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, obstructs or derails or makes an assault upon any railroad train, railroad cars, or railroad locomotive operating within such State, Territory, or place, and upon which the United States mail is carried or which is engaged in interstate commerce, for the purpose and with the intent to commit murder, robbery, or any other felony, upon said train, cars, or locomotive, or upon or against any person or persons lawfully on said train, or cars, or locomotive, shall be punished as follows: If the death of any such person is effected or thereby caused, such offender shall suffer death; if death is not caused, he shall be imprisoned not less than five nor more than twenty years.

SEC. 2. That any person who attempts to commit the offense mentioned in section 1 of this act shall be imprisoned not less than one nor more than ten years.

SEC. 3. That any person who aids, abets, or incites another to commit either of the offenses mentioned in sections 1 or 2 of this act shall be deemed a principal offender.

SEC. 4. That upon the trial of a person charged with the violation of this act it shall not be necessary to prove, nor shall it be deemed material to a conviction, that the defendant or defendants intended to effect the death of or to rob or commit a felony upon or against any particular person, but it shall be deemed sufficient if it is proved to the satisfaction of the jury that as a result of such unlawful act some person or persons had been killed, robbed, or injured, as the case may be, or that such act was committed with the design to commit any crime.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 1, line 5, after "an," insert "unlawful."

On page 1, lines 7 and 8, strike out "and upon which the United States mail is carried or."

On page 1, line 9, strike out "for the purpose and" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "or which is operating within a Territory of the United States."

On page 1, from lines 10, 11, and 12, strike out the following: "upon said train, cars, or locomotive, or upon or against any person or persons lawfully on said train, or cars, or locomotive," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "or who with such intent makes an unlawful assault upon any person lawfully on such train, cars, or locomotive."

On page 1, line 13, strike out the word "such."

The section will then read as follows:

"That any person who within any State or Territory of the United States, or other place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, obstructs or derails or makes an unlawful assault upon any railroad train, railroad cars, or railroad locomotive operating within such State, Territory, or place, which is engaged in interstate commerce, or which is operating within a district or Territory of the United States, with the intent to commit murder, robbery, or any other felony, or who with such intent makes an unlawful assault upon any person lawfully on such train, cars, or locomotive, shall be punished as follows: If the death of any person is effected or thereby caused, such offender shall suffer death; if death is not caused, he shall be imprisoned not less than five nor more than twenty years."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RAY of New York. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to have considerable time on this bill. This is a very important bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. We have only a few minutes remaining.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. This bill is too important to be rushed through in that time, and I hope it will not be insisted upon.

Mr. RAY of New York. I will take but two minutes to explain the bill, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky five minutes, and then I shall be inclined to call for a vote.

Now, this bill involves just this, nothing more and nothing less: This country of ours, in some sections, has been infested for years with train robbers, who have carried on their operations somewhat in the Territories and to a very large extent in the sparsely populated States, or in those parts sparsely populated on the frontier. The States have so little real interest in this class of criminals where the crime has been committed away from civilization that if they have acted at all it has been after a reward has been offered by the United States or by the suffering railroad or express company for the capture of these robbers. In the meantime the criminals have disappeared, and if no reward has been offered then the State has done nothing; and as the United States has been powerless to do anything, no effort has been made to capture these train robbers.

Now, if we can add to the power of the States the power of the General Government the two will act together in the suppression of these train robberies, and where the offense is committed so far from real civilization that the State does not feel like taking hold of it the United States Government will take hold of it, and we will be sure to wipe out this business of robbing and holding up trains. Now, what is the objection to it, gentlemen? The sole and only objection comes from our friends on the other side, who are sticklers for State rights. They contend we are invading a power that belongs to the State and conferring it on the Federal Government. In other words, that the Federal Government has no right and should not exercise the right to enact a law against murder and robbery upon an interstate train or a train carrying the mails.

The SPEAKER. The two minutes of the gentleman have expired.

Mr. RAY of New York. There is the objection. Now I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized in my own right.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done while the gentleman from New York has the floor. He is entitled to one hour.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Then I will let the gentleman get through, and then I will ask to be recognized.

Mr. RAY of New York. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65; noes 55.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Tellers were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH].

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 52.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. BARTLETT. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That is in order, of course.

Mr. RAY of New York. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Texas moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PAYNE. A parliamentary inquiry. Under the rule that was adopted last night if this motion to adjourn is adopted, still we can have an evening session, the rule providing that the evening session shall be had at 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. LANHAM. Then I change my motion and move that the House take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is the better form, although the rule provides for an evening session to commence at 8 o'clock. If the gentleman from Kentucky would withdraw his point of no quorum there can be no objection made to that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I withdraw the point for that purpose simply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, what becomes of my demand for the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. That will take care of itself. [Laughter.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HEATWOLE obtained an extension of his leave of absence for one week, on account of sickness.

The motion to take a recess was then agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House was declared to be in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session, with Mr. OLMSTED, Speaker pro tempore, in the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order this evening's session is devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SALE OF SITES FOR MANUFACTURING PLANTS, ETC., IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I first call up the bill (S. 5718) providing for the sale of sites for manufacturing or industrial plants in the Indian Territory.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the chief executive officer of any one of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and upon such terms and conditions as said Secretary may prescribe, sell and convey, in tracts not exceeding 40 acres, or a quarter of a quarter section, at any one place, such lands adjoining or in the vicinity of a town site in that nation, as may be desired for the establishment and operation of a manufacturing or industrial plant which will tend to encourage the cultivation of the lands held by the tribe or its members, or which will promote the general welfare of the community.

The proceeds of any such sale shall be paid to the Secretary of the Interior and be by him covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the tribe and shall be disbursed as other funds of the tribe upon the dissolution of the tribal government. Where the lands so sold and conveyed are occupied and improved by any member of the tribe he shall be compensated for his right of occupancy or improvements out of the proceeds of the sale in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct. As to lands in the Choctaw or Chickasaw Nation, such sale and conveyance must be made by the chief executive officers of the two tribes acting together, and the proceeds of the sale shall be credited in the Treasury to the two tribes according to their respective interests. After allotment has been made of the lands of any tribe desired for the establishment or operation of such plant, the sale and conveyance thereof may, during the period when alienation is otherwise prohibited or restricted, be made by the allottee in the manner and subject to the restrictions herein prescribed, instead of being made by the chief executive officer of the tribe.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the report be read, as it states what the bill is in as few words as I can state it myself.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5718) providing for the sale of sites for manufacturing or industrial plants in the Indian Territory, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment:

The title of the act correctly describes its object, which is to promote the sale and purchase of additional tribal properties adjoining or near town sites for the use of manufacturing or industrial plants. The object of the bill is to encourage the entrance of such industries into the Territory, and thus promote its material interests.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, after the word "tribe," in line 18, insert the following:

"The clerk of the United States court for the southern district shall appoint deputy clerks for the courts at Tishomingo and Ada; that in addition to the places now provided by law for holding court in said district, court shall be held at Duncan, and all laws regulating the holding of court shall be applicable to Duncan."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RATIFICATION OF AGREEMENT WITH KANSAS OR KAW INDIANS OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 12597) to ratify and confirm an agreement submitted by the Kansas or Kaw Indians of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas the Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians of Oklahoma Territory has submitted the following proposed agreement to Congress, with the request that the same be accepted, ratified, and confirmed, to wit:

AGREEMENT OF THE KANSAS OR KAW INDIANS OF OKLAHOMA TERRITORY AMONG THEMSELVES RELATIVE TO THEIR TRIBAL LANDS AND FUNDS, AND MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

This agreement and memorial of the Kansas or Kaw Indians, entered into on behalf of said Indians by Wah-shungah, Wah-moh-o-e-ke, Forrest Chouteau, Mitchel Fronkier, William Hardy, Akan Pappan, and Gen. W. E. Hardy, duly authorized to represent said tribe by a vote of a majority of the adult members thereof, at a general council held for the purpose of selecting representatives to enter into this agreement and memorial, witnesseth:

SECTION 1. The roll of the Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians, as shown by the records of the United States in the office of the United States Indian agent at the Osage Indian Angency, Oklahoma Territory, now in charge of said tribe, as it existed on the first day of December, 1901, and all decendants born between December first, 1901, and December first, 1902, to persons whose names were on said roll on December first, 1901, is hereby declared to be the roll of said tribe, and to constitute the legal membership of said tribe, and the lands and money of said tribe shall be divided among the members of said tribe, as shown by the roll made up, as directed herein, and the lands and moneys of said tribe shall be divided among said members as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. All lands belonging to said Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians located in the Territory of Oklahoma, except as herein provided, shall be divided among the members of said tribe, giving to each his or her fair share thereof, in acres, as follows:

First. There shall be set aside to each member of said tribe, as shown by the roll of membership December first, 1901, and their descendants born between that date and December first, 1902, one hundred and sixty (160) acres of land for an homestead, which shall be nontaxable and inalienable for the period of twenty-five years from the first day of January, 1903, except as hereinafter provided. Where the members of said tribe have already selected their homesteads of one hundred and sixty acres, the same are hereby confirmed, and the members who have not selected their homesteads shall do so within thirty days after the ratification of this agreement; and if any member fails to make such selection within said time, then it shall be the duty of the United States Indian agent in charge of said tribe to make the selection for such member or members: Provided, That selections of homesteads for minors shall be made by his or her parents, and the selections of homesteads for others than minors, who are unable for any reason to make their selections, shall be made by the United States Indian agent in charge of said tribes: Provided further, That in case there are any children born to members of said tribe between the ratification of this agreement and the first day of December, 1902, selection shall be made for them within thirty days after their birth, and all selections must be made on or before January first, 1903.

Second. After each member has selected his or her homestead the remaining lands in Oklahoma Territory belonging to said tribe, except as herein provided, shall be divided equally, in acres, among said members, giving to each, as nearly as practicable, the same number of acres of farming and grazing lands, and the share of each member shall be given to him or her as near as possible to his or her homestead selections. The lands, other than the homestead, set aside to each member shall be free from taxation as long as the title remains in said member, but in no event to exceed twenty-five years, and the same shall not be sold or encumbered in any way before the expiration of ten years from the date of the deed to said member, except as herein provided and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and it shall be his duty to carefully investigate each sale or transaction before he approves the same: Provided, That the lands of minors shall be inalienable during their minority: Provided further, That all selections and allotments made under this agreement shall conform to existing surveys of said reservation in tracts of not less than eighty (80) acres.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the United States Indian agent, the clerk in charge of the Kaw subagency, together with a committee of three members of the tribe, to be selected jointly by the agent, clerk in charge, and the council of the tribe, to divide the surplus lands among the members of the tribe, in accordance with this agreement.

SEC. 4. In selecting his or her homestead a member shall not be permitted to select lands already selected by another member of said tribe, unless such other member is in possession of more lands than he and his family are entitled to under this agreement; in such case, the member in possession shall have the right to make the first selection.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Interior shall furnish the head chief of said tribe deeds, properly filled out, for the conveyances herein provided for, and said head chief shall thereupon, and in the presence of the agent in charge of said tribe, proceed to execute said deeds, and when the same are executed they shall be delivered to the United States Indian agent in charge of said tribe, and it shall be his duty to see that said deeds are properly delivered to the members entitled to the same: Provided, That a separate deed shall be given to each member for the lands conveyed as a homestead: Provided further, That if, for any cause, any member of said tribe is unable to receive his or her deed, then it shall be the duty of such United States Indian agent to see that such deed is properly recorded with the register of deeds for the county in Oklahoma Territory to which the Kansas Reservation is attached.

SEC. 6. All deeds shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, which approval, and the signing of the same by the head chief, shall operate as a relinquishment to the individual member of all the right, title, and interest of the United States and of the Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians (as a tribe) in and to the lands embraced in his or her deed. All disputes between the members of said tribe as to the right of possession in the selection of homesteads shall be adjudicated and settled by the United States Indian agent in charge of said tribe, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

SEC. 7. There shall be set aside and reserved from selection or allotment one hundred and sixty (160) acres of land, including the school and agency buildings, to conform to the public survey, which said one hundred and sixty (160) acres of land said tribe cedes to the United States, including the improvements; and the United States agrees to maintain a school for the education of children of Indian blood at said place for the period of ten (10) years, and as much longer as it deems necessary, the land and improvements to be subject to final disposition by Congress. Said land shall be exempt from taxation. There shall be reserved from allotment twenty (20) acres of land, including the present cemetery, to be used as a cemetry, and the same shall be exempt from taxation. There shall be reserved from allotment eighty (80) acres, including the dwellings now used by agency trader and other buildings at said agency not used by the employees of the Government, which said eighty (80) acres shall be set aside as a town site, which shall be surveyed and laid off into town lots.

The lots in said town site are to be sold at public auction to the highest bidder, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds of said sale, after deducting the cost of the survey and sale, shall be placed in the Treasury to the credit of said Indians: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may reject any and all bids for such town lots: Provided further, That if any member of said tribe is in possession of any town lot or lots, and has any building and other improvements thereon, he shall have the right to purchase one lot seventy-five (75) feet wide by one hundred and sixty (160) feet deep, including his or her improvements, at such price as the council of said tribe may fix on the lots, exclusive of improvements: Provided, That the lots unsold shall be exempt from taxation as long as the title remains in the tribe.

SEC. 8. The funds of said tribe, including the one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars ($135,000) due said tribe under the treaty of June 14, 1846 (see Ninth U. S. S., page 842); the Kansas school fund, amounting to twenty-seven thousand one hundred seventy-four dollars and forty-one cents ($27,174.41) (see 21st U. S. S., page 70), and the Kansas general fund, amounting to twenty-six thousand nine hundred seventy-eight dollars and eighty-nine cents ($26,978.89), derived from the sale of lands in Kansas and all other moneys now due, or that may be found to be due said Indians; all money that may be received from the sale of their lands in Kansas, the money received from the sale of town lots in Oklahoma Territory, as hereinbefore provided, and all money found to be due to said tribe on claims against the United States, shall be segregated and placed to the credit of the individual members of said Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians on a basis of a pro rata division among the members of said tribe, as shown by the roll of membership of said tribe, as provided, on the first day of December, 1902, said credits to draw interest, as now authorized by law, at the rate of five (5) per centum per annum, and the interest that may accrue thereon shall be paid annually to the members entitled thereto, except in cases of minors, in which cases the interest shall be paid annually to the parent until the child for whom the interest is so paid arrives at the age of twenty-one (21) years: Provided, That if the Commissioner of Indian Affairs becomes satisfied that the interest and payment of any minor is being misused or squandered, he may withhold the payment of such interest. In case of minors whose parents have died the interest shall be paid to the legal guardian, as above provided: Provided, That the amount placed to the credit (together with the accrued interest) of each member of the tribe of the age of twenty-one (21) years may be paid to such member in ten (10) equal payments, one payment each year: Provided further, That if the Secretary of the Interior deems it advisable, he may pay to any member of said tribe, over the age of twenty-one years, the full amount of the principal and interest that may be credited to such member: Provided further, That the sum ascertained to be due said tribe shall be segregated as soon as possible after December 1, 1902: Provided further, That when the children whose shares have been placed to their credit shall arrive at the age of twenty-one (21) years, before the expiration of ten (10) years from the date of the ratification of this agreement, then the share due such member or members may be paid to them at the annual payments after they arrive at the age of twenty-one (21) years in equal amounts, so that such share will be fully paid at the expiration of said ten years; and where such children arrive at the age of twenty-one (21) years at or after the expiration of said ten years, then the full amount due such member may be paid to them at the next annual payment after they arrive at the age of twenty-one (21) years: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may withhold any of the payments provided for in this section if, in his judgment, it would be to the best interest of the member entitled to said payment to do so: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall offer at public sale all tracts or parcels of the Kansas trust and diminished reserve lands, within the State of Kansas, belonging to said Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians, for which no application has been filed under the provisions of existing laws in relation thereto. Such lands shall be offered for sale by advertisement for not less than thirty (30) days, in two newspapers in the proper land district, one of which shall be published in Morris County, Kansas, and by posting in the local land office notice for the same period, and, upon the day named in such notice, such lands shall be sold for cash to the highest bidder at not less than the price fixed by law.

SEC. 9. That all funds remaining to the credit of or found to be due from the United States to any member of said tribe, at his or her death, shall be paid to his or her heirs under the laws of the Territory or State in which such member resides at the date of his or her death.

SEC. 10. The Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, at the request of any adult member of said tribe, issue a certificate to such member authorizing him to sell and convey any or all lands deeded him by reason of this agreement, and may pay such member at the next annual payment his or her pro rata share of the funds of said tribe, if, upon consideration and examination of the request, the said Secretary shall find said member to be fully competent and capable of managing and caring for his or her individual affairs: Provided, That upon the issuance of said certificate, the lands of such member, both homestead and surplus, shall become subject to taxation, and such member shall have the right to manage and dispose of such property the same as any other citizen of the United States, and upon the issuance of said certificate and the payment of the funds due him or her such member shall be dropped from the rolls of said tribe.

SEC. 11. That the adult heirs of any deceased Kansas or Kaw Indian, whose selection has been made or to whom a deed has been issued for his or her share of the lands of said tribe in Oklahoma Territory, may sell and convey the lands inherited from such descent; and, if there be both adult and minor heirs of such inherited lands, then such minors may join in a sale thereof by a guardian duly appointed by the proper court of the county in which said minor or minors may reside, upon an order of such court made upon petition filed by such guardian; all conveyances made under this provision to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

SEC. 12. All claims, of whatever nature, which said Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians may have or claim to have against the United States shall be submitted to a commission to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior from the officers or employees of his Department for investigation, consideration, and settlement; and the United States shall, without delay, render to said tribe of Indians a complete accounting of all moneys agreed to be paid to said tribe to which said tribe may be entitled under any treaty or act of Congress. If the settlement of the claims of said tribe submitted to said commission (and the accounting) is satisfactory to said tribe, the amount found due shall be placed to the credit of the members of said tribe, according to the terms of this agreement, within one year after the report of said commission is made. But if the settlement of the claimsof said tribe or the accounting is not satisfactory to said tribe, or if they are satisfactory and Congress fails to appropriate the money to pay the same within one year after the report of said commission and the accounting, then the said tribe of Indians shall have two years from the date of the report and accounting in which to enter a suit in the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, by either party, for the amount due or claimed to be due said tribe from the United States under any treaties or laws of Congress, or for the misappropriation of any of the funds of said tribe or the failure of the United States to pay the money due the tribe. And jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said United States Court of Claims to hear and determine all claims of said tribe against the United States and to enter judgment thereon.

If the question is submitted to said court, it shall settle all the rights, both legal and equitable, of both the said Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians and of the United States. The claims submitted to the commission may be submitted by one or more petitions, to be filed by said tribe with said commission. If an action is brought in the Court of Claims, it shall be presented by a single petition, making the United States party defendant, and shall set forth all the facts on which the said Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians bases its claim or claims against the United States, and the said petition may be verified by the agent or attorney of said tribe, upon information or belief as to the existence of such facts, and no other statements or verification shall be necessary. Official letters, papers, reports, and public records, or certified copies thereof, may be used as evidence.

SEC. 13. The said Kansas or Kaw Indians hereby memorialize Congress to ratify and confirm this agreement and to make provision for carrying it into effect: Provided, That if any material amendments are made in this agreement by Congress the same shall not become effective until such amendments are approved by a majority of the adult members of the Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians.

Be it enacted, etc., That the said agreement be, and the same hereby is, accepted, ratified, and confirmed with the following amendments: Strike out section 13 and change section 14 so as to read section 13.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to accept, ratify, and confirm a proposed agreement submitted by the Kansas or Kaw Indians of Oklahoma, and for other purposes."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, while this is described as a treaty, it is in fact a memorial presented to Congress by the Kaw Indians. It imposes no burdens whatever, directly or indirectly, upon the Treasury. It provides for the distribution amongst themselves of all their funds and all their lands. That is substantially all that it does. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in an elaborate report, which I will print in the RECORD, says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, March 1, 1902.

SIR: The office is in receipt of a letter from O. A. Mitscher, esq., United States Indian agent, Osage Agency, Okla., dated February 21, 1902, transmitting an agreement and memorial of the Kansas tribe of Indians of Oklahoma Territory relative to their tribal lands and funds, signed by Wah shun gah, Wah mo o e ke, Forrest Chouteau, Mitchel Fronkier, William Hardy, Akan Pappan, and Gen. W. E. Hardy, who were elected at a tribal meeting held on February 1, 1902, as representatives of the Kaw tribe of Indians, to enter into an agreement for a division of their lands and for the distribution of their funds and to make arrangements for the sale of all tracts and parcels of trust and diminished reserve lands of the Kaw tribe within the State of Kansas, said representatives being fully authorized to represent the tribe in all matters mentioned in the agreement.

In submitting the agreement, Agent Mitscher states that the Kaw tribe of Indians at present numbers 217 persons, of which number 76 are adults, 65 of whom signed the credentials of the above-mentioned representatives; that the agreement they present represents the unanimous wish of the tribe, and he feels convinced that their action is well advised and that they are prepared to assume the responsibilities contemplated; that under tribal conditions individual effort is at a discount; that tribal inheritance leaves no incentive for accumulation of property by an individual member, and the result is directly opposite to the end desired to be reached; that instead of making the Indians independent and self-supporting, tribal relations and a community of interest tend to dependence, carelessness, indifference, shiftlessness, and downright laziness; that the tribe contains only about five families of full-blood Indians, the remainder being more or less mixed bloods and fully competent to manage their own affairs; that the full bloods are fairly intelligent, and with the restrictions and safeguards provided in the agreement, he thinks they will get along very well. He heartily concurs in the action the tribe has taken for a settlement of their relations with the Government, and states that in his judgment it will redound greatly to their advantage.

Briefly, the agreement fixes the roll of Kaw Indians and determines who shall participate in the division of the lands and a distribution of the funds; provides for the selection of a homestead by each member of the tribe, which shall be inalienable and nontaxable for twenty-five years, except as in the agreement provided; for an equitable division of the remaining lands among the members of the tribe, the lands to be alienable only as therein provided and to be free from taxation as long as the title remains with the Indians, which in no event shall exceed twenty-five years; for the execution of deeds to the individual members of the tribe by the head chief, the deeds to be properly prepared for his signature by the Secretary of the Interior; that the execution of the deeds as therein provided shall operate as a relinquishment to the individual members of all the right, title, and interest of the United States and the Kaw tribe in and to the lands; for the reservation of 160 acres for school purposes, the school to be maintained by the United States for at least ten years, the lands to be subject to final disposition by Congress; for the reservation of 20 acres as a cemetery and 80 acres as a town site, the lots to be disposed of as therein provided; for the segregation of the tribal funds and for a pro rata division of the same among the members of the tribe, the payment to be made as in the agreement provided; for the disposition at public sale of the remaining unsold tracts of Kaw trust and diminished reserve lands in the State of Kansas; for the issuance by the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, of certificates of "competency" to adult members of the tribe authorizing them to sell and convey their lands, the lands to become taxable after the issuance of such certificates; for the sale of inherited lands; for the settlement and determination by a commission to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior of all claims which the tribe has against the United States, with the right of appeal to the Court of Claims in case the accounting and settlement is not satisfactory, with the further right of appeal to the Supreme Court; for the placing of the members of the tribe under the supervision and control of the superintendent of the Kaw school after the delivery of the deeds. The Indians memorialize Congress to ratify and confirm the agreement and to make provision for carrying the same into effect.

The agreement is in entire harmony with the views of this office as expressed in its last two annual reports. The Indian must ultimately be thrown upon his own resources, and this agreement proposes to do this for the Kaw tribe. As a whole this tribe is probably as nearly ready for this step as any tribe in the country. It will be noticed, however, that the agreement does not propose to throw them upon their own resources immediately, but in such manner as to protect the rights and interests of the less competent Indians. The most important object to be attained in the elevation of the Indian race is to remove them from a state of dependence—dependence upon the Government and dependence upon tribal association. They must be individualized and treated with individually. Tribal organization and tribal association must be broken up, and each member of the tribe must learn to act for himself. The common ownership of property is not an incentive to individual effort, especially among noncivilized races. This community of interest leads to idleness and shiftlessness, with their accompanying evils.

The agreement proposes the abolishment of tribal organization and an equal division of the lands and an equal distribution of the tribal funds. This is in line with the new policy which must be adopted in dealing with the Indian if he is to be made self-supporting and to become a useful member of the community in which he lives. This step is the more important from the fact that the Indians of the Kaw tribe have reached this conclusion themselves without the intervention of this Department and with no urging from it. The office most heartily recommends the acceptance and ratification of the agreement.

There are 100,137 acres in the Kaw Reservation. On the basis of 220 members, this would give to each member of the tribe approximately 455 acres. The tribal funds approximately amount to $189,151.30. This would give each member of the tribe about $860.

The agreement and accompanying tribal authority are transmitted herewith, with the recommendation that they be submitted to Congress for action by that body.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. A. JONES,
Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I see that this treaty or bill provides for the selling of a portion of these lands.

Mr. CURTIS. There are 500 to 1,000 acres belonging to the Kaw tribe of Indians remaining in Morris County, Kans., which have not been disposed of under the treaty of 1859, and the Government is authorized to dispose of that land for the Indians. It is really a small amount of land, and this bill authorizes its sale at public auction, and that is all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does it provide that the title shall not pass until the land is paid for?

Mr. CURTIS. The title does not pass until the lands are paid for. They will be sold at auction in small tracts and they will no doubt be paid for at once.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But suppose that after this legislation, while the land is occupied by homestead settlers, after they get on to it, they say that the Government must pay the Indians for the property and the people who are on the land will get it for nothing.

Mr. CURTIS. No; this land will be sold outright, and the free-homestead law will not apply.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are not buying anything of the Indians. We are simply authorizing them to distribute their property and offer for sale this small portion of land, which is not contiguous to their reservation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The proceeds of the sale go directly to the Indians and do not come into the Government Treasury.

Mr. MADDOX. I should like to hear the gentleman from New York explain the twelfth section of this bill. It seems to be a one-sided affair. I do not know why there should be a commission at all if the report of the commission is to be accepted provided it is satisfactory and repudiated if not satisfactory. Under such conditions why have a commission at all?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to explain that matter.

Mr. CURTIS. This section is in regard to a small claim which the Kaw Indians have against the Government and which the tribe is perfectly willing to leave to a commission; but as the commission is to be composed of Government officers alone it was thought by the Department that the Indians should have the right to appeal to the Court of Claims if the finding of the commission should not be satisfactory. As will be seen by the reading of the twelfth section, the whole matter is left to a board of officers of the Government, to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior. I doubt if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] ever before heard of a case of this kind. The section meets the hearty approval of the Interior Department and the section was carefully gone over by the officers of that Department.

Mr. MADDOX. The section reads thus:

All claims, of whatever nature, which said Kansas or Kaw tribe of Indians may have or claim to have against the United States shall be submitted to a commission to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior from the officers or employees of his Department for investigation, consideration, and settlement; and the United States shall, without delay, render to said tribe of Indians a complete accounting of all moneys agreed to be paid to said tribe to which said tribe may be entitled under any treaty or act of Congress.

If the settlement of the claims of said tribe submitted to said commission (and the accounting) is satisfactory to said tribe, the amount found due shall be placed to the credit of the members of said tribe, according to the terms of this agreement, within one year after the report of said commission is made. But if the settlement of the claims of said tribe or the accounting is not satisfactory to said tribe, or if they are satisfactory and Congress fails to appropriate the money to pay the same within one year after the report of said commission and the accounting, then the said tribe of Indians shall have two years from the date of the report and accounting in which to enter a suit in the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, etc.

Now, why not provide that the claim shall be paid by the Government, and if the Government does not pay it there shall be the right to sue?

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman understands that Congress sometimes refuses to pay claims after they have been allowed, and if provision is not made for the bringing of a suit, the parties may never get the money.

Mr. MADDOX. I am aware of that; I do not base any objection on that ground; but I can not understand why we should provide for a commission with the proviso that if the finding of the commission be satisfactory to these Indians it shall be accepted, but otherwise they shall have the right to appeal.

Mr. CURTIS. The chances are that the finding will be satisfactory. The Indians would not have agreed to the appointment of a commission of Government officers if they had not had confidence that their findings will be acceptable.

Mr. MADDOX. I am not going to object, but it seems to me this provision of the bill is not a proper one and ought not to be here.

The question being taken, the amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the proposed amendment to the title will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HEIRS OF MARY CLARK AND FRANCIS CLARK.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now call up the bill (H. R. 8238) for the relief of the heirs of Mary Clark and Francis or Jenny Clark, deceased, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue a patent in fee simple to Benjamin Clark, the father and sole heir of Mary Clark and Francis or Jenny Clark, deceased, late of Oklahoma Territory, for the northwest quarter of section 17 in township 13 north, of range 8 west, of the Indian meridian, in said Territory, and the northwest quarter of section 26 in township 11 north, of range 8 west, of the Indian meridian, in said Territory, said patent to issue in lieu of a patent issued to said Francis or Jenny Clark May 20, 1892, for said first-described tract, and a patent issued to said Mary Clark on the 6th day of May, 1892, for the last-described tract; each of said patents being trust in their character and issued under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 8, 1887, as amended by the act of March 3, 1891, said allottees being members of the Cheyenne or Arapahoe tribe of Indians, children of said Benjamin Clark, and each of them being unmarried and without issue and dying intestate.

SEC. 2. That said lands when so patented shall be subject to taxation under the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 5, page 1, strike out "Benjamin Clark, the father and sole heir," and insert "heirs."

In line 9, same page, strike out "northwest" and insert "northeast."

On page 2, strike out, in lines 10, 11, and 12, the words "children of said Benjamin Clark, and each of them being unmarried and without issue and dying intestate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] to state what this bill is.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, Ben Clark is a white man who married a Cheyenne woman. They had one child. When the Cheyenne and Arapahoe reservation in Oklahoma was allotted the wife and child of Clark received allotments. Since that time both have died, and under the law Clark is their legal heir. There is a trust, however, on the land. When the land was allotted to the Indians, it was provided that no patent should issue for twenty-five years. I introduced a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to the father, Mr. Clark, but the suggestion was made at the Department that the patent should issue to the heir or heirs of these two Indians who had died, which was acceptable to me. All that this bill does is to remove the twenty-five-year restriction and to provide for the issue of the patent to this white man, if he is the heir, who had married the woman and was the father of the child.

The question being taken, the amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

KIOWA, COMANCHE, AND APACHE INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now call up the bill (H. R. 103) to open for settlement 480,000 acres of land in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian Reservation, Oklahoma Territory.

The bill was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], who reported the bill, to make a statement with reference thereto.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on June 6, 1900, Congress passed an act opening for settlement about 4,000,000 acres of land in the Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache reservations, in Oklahoma. The bill passed the House, and in the Senate was amended so as to reserve 480,000 acres out of their reservation for pasturage purposes for the Indian. This land has been set apart in portions of that reservation where it should not, in my judgment, have been set apart, as it includes agricultural lands, and not the grazing lands of the reservation. The treaty made between the United States and the Indians, made, I believe, in 1892, provided that when the lands were opened for settlement allotments should be made to the Indians. This bill now opens this 480,000 acres of pasture land under the act of June 6, 1900.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand from the gentleman's statement that when this land was originally open for settlement there was a certain portion reserved for the Indians?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Four hundred and eighty thousand acres for pasture.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was in conformity to the treaty made with the Indians?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; that was in addition to the treaty. The Indians had agreed by treaty to take 160 acres and throw open the rest. These additional 480,000 acres give them 160 acres of pasture land in addition to 160 acres of the treaty-allotted land, and this was done at the instance of the Senate. The Senate insisted that it was necessary that the Indians should have a large amount of land to pasture their stock upon, and this bill now simply carries into effect the original treaty with the Indians.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Have the Indians petitioned? Are they petitioning here for the sale of this land?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There has been no protest whatever filed, and this bill carries out the original agreement entered into in 1892 between the Indians and the United States Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Who is in possession of that land now?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is in the possession of and leased to cattlemen.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is nothing here to show that the Indians are satisfied to have this done or that any communication has been had with the tribes as to this legislation at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; I think not. I do not think they have been consulted about it. I will state that it is very necessary that this land should be opened up for settlement, because it is in the possession of cattlemen and it should be in the possession of the farmers. It is a drawback to that entire country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It belongs to these Indians, and it was set apart for them.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Only for grazing purposes, temporarily. It was a temporary arrangement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And they have not been consulted, or there is nothing here to show that they have been consulted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman is wrong in that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I mean since that law was enacted and Congress set it apart and it became their land.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That reservation was merely a temporary agreement with the Indians to allow these pasture lands to remain unallotted. Now, by this bill, we want to throw it open to settlement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Who is going to get the benefit of this land?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Indians get the benefit of it. One dollar and twenty-five cents an acre will be paid by the settlers, which is covered into the Treasury, and the Indians will get the benefit of that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Who is getting the benefit of the pasturage now?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Indians do. The cattlemen are getting the use of it, but of course they pay lease money.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman says there is nothing here to show that the Indians want this done.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In the original treaty they agreed that they would take 160 acres of land and sell the remainder of their reservation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Since Congress amended their treaty and fixed a different status there is nothing here to show that the Indians are satisfied.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They were not called upon to make any treaty at all. It was a mere gratuity, I presume, a mere donation of grass lands to the Indians on the part of Congress for grazing purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand it, Congress proposed to sell the balance of this land. All this land belonged to the Indians. The whole 4,000,000 acres belonged to the Indians until Congress legislated in 1900.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The treaty of 1892, as I have stated several times, constituted that agreement. They were to take an allotment of 160 acres of land. That has been set apart and allotted to them. The bill further set apart 480,000 acres of land for pasturage purposes. Now it is desired by this bill to open that pasture land to settlement and let the Indians have their money for it—$1.25 per acre.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, the intention was that these Indians should use this land for pasturage. Instead of that the Secretary of the Interior has construed the act to give him the right to lease these lands to cattlemen, and he has done that, and the Indians are not getting the advantage from the lands which it was intended they should get.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much an acre did they lease it for?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not know what the price is now. I think the original leases were for 10 cents an acre. They are getting more for the land now. I do not know how much.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under this bill does this money go to the Indians or go into the Treasury?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It goes into the United States Treasury and is then paid to the Indians.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under this law of 1900, the law under which the land was sold, will the Government of the United States have to pay the Indians and then the settlers get the land free?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; the settler pays a dollar and a quarter an acre for the land, and then the money goes to the Indians.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I want to find out is if there is any provision here that will make this money, if the land is sold, go directly to the Indians without the United States Government being an intervening party?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; it has to be paid through the regular channel. It goes into the Treasury and through the Treasury to the Indians, under the act of June 6, 1900.

Mr. MADDOX. It is just the same law that has prevailed all the time with reference to other reservations?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MADDOX. But have we not since then, by the passage of the free-homes bill, made this land free to the settlers, so that the Government has to pay the Indians while receiving nothing from the settlers?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That has not been done in this case in these reservations. It has been done heretofore in Oklahoma, but not with reference to the Comanche and Kiowa reservations.

Mr. MADDOX. When this treaty is ratified, that is, when this act is passed, does it not throw these lands open, and put them in exactly the same position that the others were which we did grant free?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think not.

Mr. MADDOX. Say, for instance, this land is open now to settlement. Will it not be in exactly the same position and the same situation as the other land in Oklahoma? We purchased this land and promised to pay for it, and the Government has paid for it, but the Government has thrown the land open to settlers and the settlers get it free.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Congress could do that. It could give the Indians a dollar and a quarter an acre and not require the settlers to pay for the land; but that has not been done on any part of these reservations. It has not been done for several years. The Arapahoes and Cheyennes, I think, were the last Indians whose reservations were so thrown open, and the people who went onto their lands got it for nothing; but it is not proposed to do anything of that kind here. It is proposed that the settlers on this land shall pay a dollar and a quarter an acre for it, and that the Indians shall get the money.

Mr. MADDOX. In the case of these other reservations they did not suppose anything of that sort, but afterwards the land was thrown open to settlers free. The question is now, Are you not putting this in exactly the same situation, to make the Government responsible for this?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think not.

Mr. MADDOX. That is the question I should like to hear you upon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if they are willing to accept an amendment providing that the moneys arising from the sale of this land shall be set apart in the Treasury as a separate fund belonging to these Indians, and that no title shall pass to any portion of that land until that portion which is sold is paid for.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not see at what point in the bill such an amendment could be placed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It certainly is a germane amendment to the bill. I think an amendment of that kind could be prepared if the gentleman was willing to accept it. It could come in as a new section. It could be added as section 3. "Provided that the money received from the sale of this land shall be set apart as a separate fund to go to these Indians, and no title shall be passed to any portion of the land or to that portion which is sold until the purchasers have completed all their payments." Now, if that is all the gentleman wants, if he wants the sale of the land for the benefit of the Indians, I think that amendment would accomplish that purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is a provision in the law of June 6, 1900, beginning in line 20, on page 4:

And provided further, That the money arising from the sale of said lands shall be paid to said Indians in the same manner as was provided in the said act of June 6, 1900.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not got that act, so I can not read it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. You will find this provision on page 4 of the act of June 6, 1900:

And provided further, That should any of said lands allotted to said Indians or opened to settlement under this act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Right there is where I understand is what I wanted to remedy if I could. That is a general provision of law now, and that money under the old law, and under this agreement or contract made with the Government agents, whatever has been paid has gone to the general fund in the Treasury, and then if the land was opened to free homestead entry, why then the Government of the United States had to pay the Indians, if it was ever paid for at all, instead of the settler.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I find a provision in this bill covering the objection you have made—on line 11, page 4:

Provided, That in addition to the land-office fees prescribed by statute for such entries the entryman shall pay $1.25 per acre for the land entered at the time of submitting his final proof.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I ask the gentleman to accept is an amendment to keep this money as a separate fund for these Indians. I think the time has come when, if we are going to open up these rich Indian reservations for settlement, that we ought to set apart this money as belonging to the Indians, and to be held in a separate fund by the Government for the Indians.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This does that. If the gentleman will read lines 23 and 24 he will see this language:

And provided further, That the money arising from the sale of said lands shall be paid to said Indians in the same manner as was provided in the said act of June 6, 1900.

That act provided that it should be covered into the Treasury and paid out to the Indians. You certainly would have the Government supervise the sale of the lands and pay the money out to the Indians, as we do under this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand it, this act merely provides that this land shall be sold as all land has been sold before.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; it is to be sold under the act of June 6, 1900, and this act provides:

That the money arising from the sale of this land shall be paid to said Indians in the same manner as was provided in the said act of June 6, 1900.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask my friend from Texas what objection can there be to providing in this bill that this money, the proceeds of the sale of this land, shall be set apart as a separate fund belonging to the Indians?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Because it is already provided for here in this bill in direct language, as follows:

Provided, That in addition to the land-office fees prescribed by statute for such entries the entryman shall pay $1.25 per acre for the land entered at the time of submitting his final proof.

Then, also, in lines 23 and 24:

That the money arising from the sale of said lands shall be paid to said Indians in the same manner as was provided in the said act of June 6, 1900.

It is thus set apart as a separate fund.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under the act and kept separate?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, if that is so, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. CANNON. I want a minute about this to see if I understand, and if I do understand it I am against it. I recollect when this legislation was had in 1900 for us to open these reservations for settlement. There was pending a treaty that was tried to be ratified. A great railroad company had surveyed these lands, and there were multiplied thousands of people who wanted to go in there and make homes, and between the railroad people and the desire of people to make homes and the pending treaty Congress went to work to throw open the reservation—legislate.

And it was a mighty hard time for legislation with us. I was not on this committee, nor either of them, nor on the conference committees, but I recollect that as a member of the House I had more or less knowledge about it, and it was through great tribulation that this legislation was finally had; and the friends of the red men in the Senate put upon us—and when I say upon us I mean the United States—some pretty severe restrictions.

They ratified the treaty, paid the Indians for the land, and then after they paid the Indians for this 480,000 acres of land they turned around and gave it to him to be held in common. I see the gentleman from Oklahoma is present. He is more familiar with these matters than I am, but that is the way I recollect it, and the gentleman from Oklahoma will correct me if I am wrong.

Now, two years have not passed away, the reservation is open, the people have gone in there, the Indian lands have been allotted, and these 480,000 acres are held in common for the benefit of the Indians after the United States has bought the Indians off and given it back to them to be held in common. Now, what is the proposition, if I understand it, in this bill? It is to authorize the homesteading of this land, and it must be paid for at the rate of $1.25 an acre, and that $1.25 an acre is to go to the Indians.

I asked somebody what the land was worth, and he said, "Oh, five to seven dollars an acre." It is good land. Mind you, the Indians got the land in common; 480,000 acres. True, it was a hard bargain, as I noted heretofore, but he holds it in common by the action of the Congress of the United States. Now, how are you going to get it out of the Indian? Why, this bill just takes it out of him. Not a Cæsarian operation, but a drastic operation, without asking the Indian a word about it. It takes the Indian's land—480,000 acres—that he owns under an act of Congress, without his consent, throws it open to settlement, makes the bargain for two, when the merest tyro in the law understands that it takes two to make a bargain. Here one man makes the bargain, namely, the United States, and sells it at $1.25 an acre.

Now, then, I undertake to say, if I am correct about this—and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], who is the chairman of this committee, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] will correct me if I am incorrect—I undertake to say if we enact this legislation and the title of this land, which is worth $5 an acre, is so conferred, in God's chancery and in man's chancery the United States is responsible for the difference between $1.25 an acre and five or six or seven dollars an acre.

Now, with all due respect, if I am right about this it is time to call a halt. I am getting pretty tired of the United States dealing in homestead lands and Indian lands and arid lands down in that section of the country. In my short time I have seen the United States Government mulcted twenty-five or thirty million dollars—extinguishing the title and then giving them, by Executive order, another reservation, and extinguishing the title and paying for it, and then throwing it open to homestead settlement to be paid for at $1.25 per acre, and then giving it for free homes. Let us call a halt, and I know of no better place to call it than upon this bill for the reasons I have indicated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes had it.

So the House refused to order the bill to be engrossed.

AGREEMENT WITH CREEK TRIBE OF INDIANS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now call up bill H. R. 13171, and I ask unanimous consent to substitute for that the Senate bill 4923, to ratify and confirm a supplemental agreement with the Creek tribe of Indians, and for other purposes. It is a similar bill, with very few minor changes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to substitute for the House bill the Senate bill 4923. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill, read as follows:

9. If the rolls of citizenship provided for by the act of Congress approved March 1, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 861), shall have been completed by said commission prior to the ratification of this agreement, the names of children entitled to enrollment under the provisions of sections 7 and 8 hereof shall be placed upon a supplemental roll of citizens of the Creek Nation, and said supplemental roll when approved by the Secretary of the Interior shall in all respects be held to be a part of the final rolls of citizenship of said tribe.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, after line 15, add the following:

"Provided, That the Dawes Commission be, and is hereby, authorized to add the following persons to the Creek roll: Nar wal le pe se, Mary Washington, Walter Washington, and Willie Washington, who are Creek Indians, but whose names were left off the roll through neglect on their part."

Mr. LITTLE. I would like some explanation of this amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I will ask to have read a letter explaining why the adoption of this amendment is asked. It is a letter from the Dawes Commission, approved by the principal chief of the nation.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
COMMISSION TO THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES,
Muscogee, Ind. T., June 4, 1902.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I desire to call attention to some needed legislation in the matter of the application of certain Indians now residing in the Creek Nation who claim citizenship as Creeks by virtue of their blood and residence in said nation.

These Indians, for whom it seems no provision is made, are part Creek and part Shawnee; they do not appear on any of the Creek rolls, neither have they been given allotments in the Shawnee country. They have resided in the Creek Nation for several years, but it seems that they have never made any effort to be placed on the rolls of the Creek Nation prior to this time.

I would suggest, in the event that you deem such action proper, that an amendment be made on the floor of the House to the pending Creek agreement which shall provide by name for the enrollment of the following: Nar wal le pe se (female), Mary Washington, Walter Washington, and Willie Washington, who are the Creek citizens herein referred to.

Yours, truly,

TAMS BIXBY, Acting Chairman.

Approved.

P. PORTER, Principal Chief.

Mr. CURTIS. That is approved by the chief of the tribe as well as by the Dawes Commission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand, this proposition is to thrust these people into the ownership of land in that country by naming them in this bill.

Mr. CURTIS. These Indians were entitled to enrollment had they applied at the proper time, before the rolls were closed, but they neglected to do so. The principal chief of the nation representing the nation, and the Dawes Commission representing the Government say that these three or four people are entitled to enrollment. I have offered this amendment at the suggestion of the representative of the Government of the United States and the representative of the Creek Nation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the proposition, a roll was made up in a sort of judicial way to determine who were the heirs of this proporty. The parties claiming interest therein had their day in court in which to apply for enrollment. Now, the gentleman proposes to legislate into this enrollment some people who were not placed there under the original law. I do not mean to say that this may not be a just proceeding, but I ask the gentleman from Kansas this question: If Congress undertakes to legislate people into property rights by this class of legislation, where are we to stop?

Mr. CURTIS. Congress would not generally do that; but in a case where the proceeding is recommended by the Commission representing the Government, and by the principal of the nation, it seems to me no harm can be done. If the gentleman objects, however, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. I should like to know whether there is any dispute about the citizenship of these Indians?

Mr. CURTIS. None in the world. They belong to the two tribes—the Shawnees and the Creeks. As the gentleman knows, it has been the practice in our legislation to allow these people to select which tribe they would join. They have not selected the other tribe, and now they come in and ask to be admitted to this tribe.

As I have already said, this proposition has met the approval of the chief of the nation and of the Dawes Commission.

Mr. McRAE. Why did not the Dawes Commission admit them?

Mr. CURTIS. The time for closing the roll had already passed before these Indians made their application. If any gentleman says that he objects to this proposition I will withdraw it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will only ask the gentleman this question: Does he know these people?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not; I have no information about the matter, except what comes from the officers of the Government and the chief of the tribe.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman know whether these are full-blooded Indians or whether they are white people——

Mr. CURTIS. I do not know anything on earth about the matter, except what is stated in the letter which has been read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I ask the gentleman to let this proposition go over. I think it is a dangerous amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk, continuing the reading, read the following:

11. In all instances of the establishment of town sites in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 31, 1900 (31 Stat. L., 231), or those of section 10 of the agreement ratified by act of Congress approved March 1, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 861), authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, upon the recommendation of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, at any time before allotment, to set aside and reserve from allotment any lands in the Creek Nation not exceeding 160 acres in any one tract, at such stations as are or shall be established in conformity with law on the line of any railroad which shall be constructed, or be in process of construction, in or through said nation prior to the allotment of lands therein, any citizen who shall have previously selected such town site, or any portion thereof, for his allotment, or who shall have been by reason of improvements therein entitled to select the same for his allotment, shall be paid by the Creek Nation the full value of his improvements thereon at the time of the establishment of the town site, and 10 per cent of the net proceeds arising from the sale of that portion of the land within the town site so selected by him, or which he was so entitled to select; and this shall be in addition to his right to receive from other lands an allotment of 160 acres.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer an amendment to make this bill correspond with the bill reported by the House committee. It is an amendment suggested by the Interior Department and was inserted in the House bill by the committee.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

On page 7, after the word "site," in line 25, insert:

"Under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That such citizens may purchase any of said lands in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 1, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 61): And provided further, That the lands which may hereafter be set aside and reserved for town sites upon recommendation of the Dawes Commission as herein provided shall embrace such acreage as may be necessary for the present needs and reasonable prospective growth of such town sites, and not to exceed 640 acres for each town site."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

16. Lands allotted to citizens hereunder shall not in any manner whatever or at any time be encumbered, taken, or sold to secure or satisfy any debt or obligation nor be alienated by the allottee or his heirs before the expiration of five years from the date of the deed therefor, except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Each citizen shall select from his allotment 40 acres of land, or a quarter of a quarter section, as a homestead, which shall be and remain nontaxable, inalienable, and free from any incumbrance whatever for twenty-one years from the date of the deed therefor, and a separate deed shall be issued to each allottee for his homestead, in which this condition shall appear.

Selections of homesteads for minors, prisoners, convicts, incompetents, and aged and infirm persons, who can not select for themselves, may be made in the manner herein provided for the selection of their allotments, and if for any reason such selection be not made for any citizen it shall be the duty of said Commission to make selection for him. The homestead of each citizen shall remain, after the death of the allottee, for the use and support of children born to him after May 25, 1901, but if he have no such issue then he may dispose of his homestead by will, free from the limitation herein imposed, and if this be not done, the land embraced in his homestead shall descend to his heirs, free from such limitation, according to the laws of descent herein otherwise prescribed. Any agreement or conveyance of any kind or character violative of any of the provisions of this paragraph shall be absolutely void and not susceptible of ratification in any manner, and no rule of estoppel shall ever prevent the assertion of its invalidity.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I move the following amendment:

On page 9, line 18, strike out the word "hereunder."

I would state that allotments are not made under this treaty, but under the treaty of 1901, and that word should be stricken out.

The Clerk reported the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken and the amendment agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I have another amendment:

On page 10, line 8, strike out the word "herein."

The Clerk reported the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken and the amendment agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

17. Section 37 of the agreement ratified by said act of March 1, 1901, is amended, and as so amended is reenacted to read as follows:

"During the continuance of the tribal government Creek citizens may rent their allotments, when selected for strictly nonmineral purposes, for a term not to exceed three year, but without any stipulation or obligation to renew the same. Such leases for a period longer than three years and leases for mineral purposes may also be made with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and not otherwise.

"Any agreement or lease of any kind or character violative of this paragraph shall be absolutely void and not susceptible of ratification in any manner, and no rule of estoppel shall ever prevent the assertion of its invalidity. Cattle grazed upon leased allotments shall not be liable to any tribal tax, but when cattle are introduced into the Creek Nation and grazed on lands not selected for allotment by citizens, the Secretary of the Interior shall collect from the owners thereof a reasonable grazing tax for the benefit of the tribe, and section 2117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not hereafter apply to Creek lands."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas and Mr. CURTIS rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I wish to offer; but I suppose the committee amendment, if the gentleman from Kansas has another, takes precedence.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

Strike out, on page 11, line 4, the words "when selected."

The Clerk reported the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Kansas if he has not another committee amendment as to the length of the leases that may be made. I think we changed it from three to five years, with a provision that grazing leases should not exceed one year.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that the amendment agreed to by the committee in in the House bill limits the grazing leases to one year, the agricultural leases to five years, and the mineral and other leases for a longer time, only subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to go back to section 16.

Mr. LITTLE. Had we not better finish section 17 while we are at it?

Mr. CURTIS. I would suggest to the gentleman that I will take care of that later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that this is a proceeding in the House, and not in the Committee of the Whole. It will be in order to offer an amendment at any time after the entire bill has been read.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I will go back at that time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is another committee amendment to the section that we are now considering.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that, but I would like to explain that this is the Senate bill which has been just called up, and the members of the committee have had but three or four minutes in which to compare it. I have not had time to go through it all, and I will suggest that I will go back after the bill has been read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is page 15 of the House bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that he simply offer section 17 of the House bill as a substitute for the pending section. I think it would be difficult to arrange the several other amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that it is not regular to read the bill by sections in the House in this way. The proper way is to read the bill entirely through.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that this is a better plan, the way we are doing now, and I ask unanimous consent that we proceed as we have been doing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection, we will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs or sections for amendment. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will now call for the reading of the amendment which I offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "same," in line 7, page 11, insert the words "and agricultural leases heretofore made in good faith for a fair consideration to the allottees are hereby validated for a period not exceeding five years from the date of the ratification of this agreement."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that the part of the bill to which that amendment applies has not yet been reached.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I thought it had. Then let it be considered as pending.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I notice these leases are ratified, but there is no provision here with reference to the approval of any of them by the Department. I do not know whether the matter came up in the committee or not. I have no objection whatever to the ratification, but I think there should be supervision of this matter by the Secretary of the Interior. I want to add, after the word "years," in line 5, the section now reading—

During the continuance of the tribal government Creek citizens may rent their allotments when selected, for strictly nonmineral purposes, for a term not exceeding—five years for agricultural lands.

The amendment said—

I want to add—

subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman from Oklahoma will permit, I think if he will read the provision as amended by the committee, it covers that point, and I would like to offer as a substitute for this section the section as amended by the House committee.

Mr. FLYNN. Let us have that read. I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for section 17 of the Senate bill the following:

"17. Section 37 of the agreement ratified by said act of March 1, 1901, is amended, and as so amended is reenacted to read as follows:

"'Creek citizens may rent their allotments, when selected for strictly nonmineral purposes, for a term not to exceed one year for grazing purposes only and for a period not to exceed five years for agricultural purposes, but without any stipulation or obligation to renew the same. Such leases for a period longer than one year for grazing purposes and for a period longer than five years for agricultural purposes, and leases for mineral purposes may also be made with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and not otherwise.

"'Any agreement or lease of any kind or character violative of this paragraph shall be absolutely void and not susceptible of ratification in any manner, and no rule of estoppel shall ever prevent the assertion of its invalidity. Cattle grazed upon leased allotments shall not be liable to any tribal tax, but when cattle are introduced into the Creek Nation and grazed on lands not selected for allotment by citizens, the Secretary of the Interior shall collect from the owners thereof a reasonable grazing tax for the benefit of the tribe, and section 2117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not hereafter apply to Creek lands.'"

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "when selected," in lines 4 and 5.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One moment. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] offered an amendment to this section. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] offers a substitute for the section. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas is first in order. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I withdraw the amendment for the present. After the substitute is read, then I will offer my amendment, if the substitution is made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] withdraws his amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Now I move to amend the substitute by striking out the words "when selected," in lines 4 and 5.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas moves to amend the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas by striking out the words he has indicated?

Mr. CURTIS. The words "when selected."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the substitute.

The amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. FLYNN. One moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ZENOR. I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment to the substitute, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ZENOR. After the word "otherwise," in line 13, on page 15 of the House bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "otherwise," in line 13 of the substitute, the following:

"But agricultural leases heretofore made in good faith, and for a fair consideration to the allottee, are hereby validated for the period of five years from the ratification of this agreement."

Mr. ZENOR. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment is substantially, if it is not verbatim, a copy of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is the same amendment. I intended to reoffer that, but I will accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ZENOR].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that amendment ought to be adopted. The committee considered that question quite thoroughly. It was considered not only by the committee of the House, but by the joint committee of the two Houses, and it was on due consideration by them rejected.

It is a matter of common knowledge in that country, and known at least to some members of the House, that there are leases and indirect sales of various kinds which have been made in that country upon these lands, when the treaty under which they were made declared that they should not be made for exceeding one year. That was the written law, and I do not believe Congress ought blindly, simply by a blanket ratification, to approve leases that it does not know anything about, and does not provide any way at all to determine. When the leases were made, they were made in the face of the law, and by those who knew the law. I hope the House will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask my friend from Arkansas what is section 2117 that they propose to strike out?

Mr. LITTLE. That refers simply to the cattle tax on cattle imported into the Territory, and has nothing to do with the question under discussion at all. This is just simply a proposition to come here and ask Congress to say that all bona fide agricultural leases shall be ratified for a term of five years.

I have understood that there are three or four hundred thousand acres of land leased by various companies, probably some of them bona fide, some entirely speculative, with a provision in many of them for a release of them from year to year, making it equivalent to a title; some with an agreement to sell, and the Lord knows what else; so far as I am concerned, I do not think Congress in this way ought to ratify and agree to any such agreement.

I do not believe a man in the House has seen any of these leases. I have not seen one of them, and to say that all bona fide agricultural leases shall be approved for a term of five years when they were made under a law authorizing a lease of one year, I think this is simply a blind leap in the dark, calculated to do irreparable injury, because we do not know what we are doing. It has been so thoroughly considered by the committees of the Senate and the House, acting separately and jointly, and also the bill having passed the Senate, without amendment in the Senate, I do not think it ought to be pressed on this occasion.

Mr. ZENOR. Mr. Speaker, I differ with my distinguished friend from Arkansas in his view of the subject of this amendment. In the first place, I think it is perfectly apparent, or at least sufficient evidence appeared before the committee reporting this bill, that the Creek Indians are intelligent, civilized, and amply able to take care of themselves, and it seems to me that any such restriction placed upon them in the management of their lands should not be made.

When we began the allotment of these lands of the Chickasaws and the Choctaws, a provision was made in the treaty with the Chickasaw and the Choctaw nations that those tribes should be permitted to lease their lands for a term of five years, and I can not see any reason why the same rule should not prevail when you come to apply the law and establish rules and regulations in regard to the allotments made to the Creek Indians.

Again, Mr. Speaker—and I think that the members of the committee will bear me out in this statement—a large number of leases have been made and entered into between the allottees and certain white people who have gone into that country since the ratification of the treaty of May, 1901. Now, these leases are not, I insist, made, as the gentleman from Arkansas insists they were, in defiance of law. They were made in pursuance of an agreement ratified in the original treaty, and these leases are to-day binding leases.

Now, then, the business interests of the Creek Nation is hampered by reason of the fact that you impose limitations upon the allottees, the Indians, when you make allotments to him and then when the segregations have been made of their land that they shall have no right to lease them for more than one year. That is the provision here so far as grazing purposes are concerned.

Now, it can be well understood, gentlemen, how it retards the development of that country and how it prevents business men giving credit to the allottees, the owners of this land, where they can not execute a lease to a white man, the man who has gone into that Territory to take a farm and lease lands to develop the Territory, with a view of putting improvements upon it. He can not afford to take a lease for one year.

Going to live on the land, he is bound to improve it to such an extent as to make it profitable to him; and with a one-year lease he can not afford to do it. There are a great many white men who have gone into this country and improved these lands, and yet there is a provision made in respect to the leasing of grazing lands that it shall be simply for one year. What is the purpose of allotting these lands to the Indians? One hundred and sixty acres are allotted to each one of these Creek Indians, and as a general rule there are about five to a family, which makes about 800 acres of land allotted to each head of a family in the Creek Nation.

Now, it is perfectly apparent that the Indian can not cultivate 800 acres of land and make it profitable, and it is absolutely an impediment to the people down there and prevents the development of that country. There ought to be some provision giving to the allottees the right to lease the land in such a way as would permit it to be profitable to the person leasing the land and enable them to put improvements upon it and enable them to get credit with their merchants and business men with whom they do business; and these men ought not to be prejudiced by unreasonable restrictions imposed upon the right of allottees to make and enter into leases of their lands for a reasonable term.

Under the original agreement, Mr. Speaker, there was no restriction placed upon the owners of these allotments with reference to their power to renew or enter into an obligation to renew a lease, and under the provisions of this amendment there are such restrictions, and they can not agree in the lease to renew the lease. Under the original agreement ratified by Congress there was no such restriction placed upon the owners of these allotments, and therefore a man that entered into a lease should be protected; and it seems to me no prejudice could result to the Indians, no prejudice to the allottees, but an absolute benefit will be derived all along if they want to ratify the lease.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ZENOR. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What would be the effect of this amendment proposed by you upon leases now in existence that will terminate in six or twelve or even three months?

Mr. ZENOR. I do not think it would result in any increase or lengthen the term of the lease that was in existence at that time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But your amendment ratifies them for five years.

Mr. ZENOR. For five years.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Even if they had only three months to run?

Mr. ZENOR. Yes. I am not advised on the subject of the different leases made by these allottees, but if you adopt my amendment, and the supplemental agreement now proposed to Congress for ratification shall be ratified by the council of the Creek Nation, and they consent to the agreement as ratified by Congress, then it would be a binding contract and would have the effect of extending the leases for five years.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment will be voted down. The question was thoroughly discussed before the joint committee of the Senate and the House, and the amendment was voted down by the joint committee. It was considered by the House committee and voted down, and, as the gentleman from Arkansas well says, we know nothing about these leases. It seems to me it would be very unwise for Congress to approve, for a period of five years, leases that it knows nothing about.

Mr. LITTLE. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Can the gentleman give any idea as to about how much of that country is covered by these wild-cat leases?

Mr. CURTIS. I am informed by the people living down there that there are from five to seven hundred thousand acres of land covered by these leases. Of course I have no personal knowledge of the matter, and know nothing about it except the information from the people down there.

Mr. LACEY. How many leases, if the gentleman knows, are there on one lot?

Mr. CURTIS. I understand there are as many as three leases on one piece of property.

Mr. LACEY. And which would we validate by this amendment?

Mr. LITTLE. It would be difficult to tell which one we would ratify.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I might say in regard to the leases that were lately entered into between the Secretary of the Interior and the Indians at Standing Rock Reservation, that a great deal of opposition was developed by the Indians and those in authority at that reservation. All these leases of grazing lands bring at once the Indian into opposition with the herder and the grazer. It creates opposition between the two, and it brings the source of contamination close to the home of the Indian.

As in the case of the Standing Rock Reservation, the lands that were selected to be leased under the lease were not those that were approved of by the Indians, but, on the contrary, they gave to the lessors or those who entered into the leases the very best lands, and took them away from the Indians, so that they could not make their livelihood by entering into the business of grazing and raising of cattle. On that particular reservation there are to-day, standing on the books of the agency, 250 self-supporting Indians simply through the result of their own efforts in raising cattle and grazing on that reservation.

Those Indians were willing to come before the Secretary of the Interior and were willing to have their lands allotted in severalty, provided they were paid what was owing to them by the Government; they would not wait until the time which was stipulated, provided their land was not leased. They had their personal representatives here, and I went with them to see the Secretary of the Interior and to see the President of the United States, who listened carefully to what they had to say. But it seems that the leases were practically settled and signed before they had an opportunity to speak.

Therefore, from my knowledge of it, which includes some personal knowledge of the reservation, because I have visited it on several occasions, I think any indiscriminate leasing of the Indian lands ought not to be authorized unless we have the names of those who desire to lease the lands, the terms of the lease, and the fact as to whether or not the lessors are responsible for the obligations that they are about to enter into. Unless we have those facts placed before the House we should not authorize the leasing of any of these lands on any of the reservations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ZENOR].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLYNN. On line 7 of the bill there is this provision, to which I wish to offer an amendment:

For grazing purposes only, and for a period not exceeding five years for agricultural purposes.

I move to amend by adding to this clause the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior." This is customary in all leases made by Indians.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is this amendment presented as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. FLYNN. It is.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman think it necessary to insert that provision? I hardly think so, in view of the terms of the lease.

Mr. FLYNN. The gentleman will see that further on it is provided that leases for mineral purposes may also be made with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and not otherwise. In no Indian reservation in the United States, so far as I know, where the land has been allotted or where it is under the control of the Government, can a lease be made for any period of time without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LITTLE. My recollection is that in the Choctaw and Chickasaw country, under the treaty with those Indians leases can be made for five years without such approval.

Mr. FLYNN. I do not think so.

Mr. LITTLE. That is my recollection, though I do not make the statement positively.

Mr. CURTIS. That is correct as to the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

Mr. LITTLE. The provision here is framed partly in analogy with that arrangement.

Mr. FLYNN. All right. If the committee are satisfied, it will suit me. I withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The substitute was agreed to.

The Clerk, continuing the reading, read the following:

16. Lands allotted to citizens hereunder shall not in any manner whatever or at any time be encumbered, taken, or sold to secure or satisfy any debt or obligation nor be alienated by the allottee or his heirs before the expiration of five years from the date of the deed therefor, except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Each citizen shall select from his allotment 40 acres of land, or a quarter of a quarter section, as a homestead, which shall be and remain nontaxable, inalienable, and free from any incumbrance whatever for twenty-one years from the date of the deed therefor, and a separate deed shall be issued to each allottee for his homestead, in which this condition shall appear.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to amend by striking out, in line 22, page 9, the words "deed therefor" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "approval of this supplemental agreement."

Mr. ZENOR. I move to amend the amendment by substituting in lieu of the words "approval of this supplemental agreement" the words "ratification of the original agreement in May, 1901."

I will state the purpose of this amendment. In the original treaty there was a provision that the deed could be made to the allottees after five years from the date of the ratification of that treaty. That was the original agreement between the Indian tribe and the Government of the United States. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is to change the date on which the deeds are to be made. This change of date was not suggested by the Indian council or by the Indian tribe. It is a suggestion evidently coming from the Interior Department itself.

Now, it can well be understood that deeds issuing from the Government issue at irregular and different times, and under the provision proposed, there will be no fixed date from which deeds made to these allotments shall run. There ought to be a fixed time. If the ratification or the approval of the agreement be fixed upon as the date, it is a postponement of the date for one year after the time agreed upon between the Creek tribe and the Government of the United States. The date at which these Indians were to receive title to these lands was at the expiration of five years from the ratification of the original treaty made in May, 1901.

I think it but fair to the parties that the date fixed upon for the making of these deeds should be in accordance with the agreement between the Indian tribe and the Government, and that there should be no postponement of this date; that the titles should take effect five years after the date originally agreed upon. It is for the interest of the business people down in that Territory that the date originally agreed upon shall be adhered to.

According to all the information that I have, a proposition such as that embraced in the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas is regarded by the people in that Territory as detrimental to business interests and to the development of the particular tribe in that Territory. I therefore offer my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. The statement made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ZENOR] in regard to the first treaty is correct; but I hope the amendment which the gentleman has offered to my amendment will be voted down and my amendment adopted; because the amendment I have submitted is the amendment which was agreed upon by the full Committee on Indian Affairs at its last meeting.

It was not suggested, as the gentleman says, by the Indians, nor was it suggested by the Department; but some member of the committee—I know not whom, or if I did know I have forgotten whom—suggested that some date ought to be fixed. If it be put from the date of the deeds, the deeds naturally being made on different dates, thus there would be no uniformity.

Therefore the date was agreed to by the committee, and, as I understand it, the vote was unanimous in fixing it from the ratification of the treaty. I therefore hope the amendment to the amendment will be voted down and that the amendment as offered by myself will be agreed to.

Mr. ZENOR. Mr. Speaker, I will ask my colleague whether it is not his understanding that since the ratification of the original treaty of May, 1901, some of these deeds have been issued to the allottees?

Mr. CURTIS. Not a single deed has been delivered.

Mr. ZENOR. They have been issued by the Interior Department?

Mr. CURTIS. You might say no. They have been prepared, but they are in the hands of the Government officers and not a deed has been delivered.

Mr. ZENOR. To any of the allottees?

Mr. CURTIS. Not a single deed, is my information.

Mr. ZENOR. I have had some information to the effect that perhaps some of these deeds have been delivered by the Department.

Mr. CURTIS. Not one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ZENOR] is rather a substitute than an amendment. The question is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I offered an amendment, which is in the hands of the Clerk, on page 6, at the end of line 15, and I desire now to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the following note which I have received from the chairman of the Dawes Commission. He says:

These people are desperately poor, full-blooded Indians, who do not speak a word of English.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, all I asked the gentleman in regard to the matter when it was up before, was as to whether they were full-blooded Indians. I do not know these other people. I think it is a dangerous proposition to open up these lists in the Dawes case. I know the gentleman from Kansas, and I am entirely willing in such a matter to rely on his opinion, and if he thinks, as I stated before, or if he is willing to state to the House that these are full-blooded Indians and an injustice will be done them if they are not put in the bill, I will withdraw all objection.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the statement upon the authority of the chairman of the Dawes Commission. He says they are full-blooded Indians.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I would say that that is satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is upon the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 13172) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISSISSIPPI CHOCTAWS.

41. All persons duly identified by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes under the provisions of section 21 of the act of Congress approved June 28, 1898 (30 Stats., 495) as Mississippi Choctaws entitled to benefits under article 14 of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Nation, concluded September 27, 1830, may, at any time within six months after the date of the final ratification of this agreement, make bona fide settlement within the Choctaw-Chickasaw country, and upon proof of such settlement to such Commission within one year after the date of the final ratification of this agreement may be enrolled by such Commission as Mississippi Choctaws entitled to allotment as herein provided for citizens of the tribes, subject to the special provisions herein provided as to Mississippi Choctaws, and said enrollment shall be final when approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The application of no person for identification as a Mississippi Choctaw shall be received by said Commission after the date of the final ratification of this agreement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following as a substitute for section 32 of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman if he would not just as soon wait until the bill is read, and then let us commence at the first of the bill and start with that.

Mr. LITTLE. I would suggest to the gentleman that outside of the controverted point, when we get through with these we can agree on the ordinary amendments in bulk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers the following substitute, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 32. Said citizenship court shall also have appellate jurisdiction over all judgments of the courts in Indian Territory rendered under said act of Congress of June 10, 1896, admitting persons to citizenship or to enrollment as citizens in either of said nations. The right of appeal may be exercised by the said nations jointly or by either of them acting separately at any time within six months after this agreement is finally ratified. In the exercise of such appellate jurisdiction said citizenship court shall be authorized to consider, review, and revise all such judgments, both as to findings of fact and conclusions of law, and may, wherever in its judgment substantial justice will thereby be subserved, permit either party to any such appeal to take and present such further evidence as may be necessary to enable said court to determine the very right of the controversy. And said court shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations prescribing the manner of taking and conducting said appeals and of taking additional evidence therein.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I believe this has been substantially agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I propose the following amendment, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words, in lines 6 and 7, on page 32: "The final ratification of this agreement" and insert the folowing: "Their identification as Mississippi Choctaws by the said;" so that it will read as follows: "May at any time within six months after the date of their identification as Mississippi Choctaws by the said Commission make bona fide settlement."

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly apparent to those who will think for a moment that this amendment ought to be adopted. It is hard indeed to understand why sensible men should negotiate a treaty that might be construed to defeat the very objects of it. If these words remain as they are in the treaty now, we might have this kind of a case: A Mississippi Choctaw applies for identification.

His application is continued, as these applications have been continued practically up to date. There are thousands of them pending to-day before the Secretary of the Interior. If this treaty remains as now proposed, the Mississippi Choctaw is required within six months after the date of final ratification to become a bona fide settler; and yet if he dares go into the Territory before he is identified, he is an intruder.

I have in mind people in my district whose ancestors took land under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830, and these people are as much entitled to participate in the lands owned by the Choctaws as anybody. But under the right guaranteed to them by Article XIV of the treaty of 1830 they have seen fit to remain in the States. They have, however, a right at any time to go there.

This provision seeks to preserve that right. Yet, while their application for identification is pending, and while they can not get a decision upon it, you tell them by this new treaty that they must get in within six months after the ratification, although the ratification may come long before the identification paper is issued. Now, if the purpose is to give these people six months after they know that they have a right to be there, then why not say so?

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. McRAE. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not catch the wording of your amendment. How much time is given by your amendment to these Mississippi Choctaws in which to file their applications?

Mr. McRAE. I was not dealing with the question of applications, because those I have named have already filed theirs, but this provision requires them to get into the Territory within six months after ratification. I say it should be within six months after they know that thay have a right to be there.

Mr. CURTIS. You give them six months after identification?

Mr. McRAE. Yes; instead of after the ratification. Then the second amendment would give them the same time you propose, one year after identification, to make bona fide improvement. It seems to me that unless the purpose is to get the advantage of the people whose rights you seek to protect, that there should be no objection to this amendment; because, I take it, that is the intent of this provision.

Yet the words adopted may be construed to defeat a pending application, or the applicant must take the risk of going in there without authority; and I want to say that in the case of these people whom I have in mind, they have applied to the Secretary of the Interior to know whether after the application has been filed they have a right to go and select land, and the answer has been, "You must determine that question yourselves," and they are referred to the Dawes Commission. These applications have been pending for years——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest to the gentleman that I do not believe there is any objection on this side to his amendment, if he will allow it to come to a vote.

Mr. McRAE. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McRAE. I also propose the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words, in lines 9 and 10, on page 32: "The final ratification of this agreement may" and insert the following: "Their said identification as Mississippi Choctaws shall."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, upon this section I desire to offer the following amendment——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Before that is offered——

Mr. CURTIS. I will withdraw the amendment for a minute.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that is in addition to the section as it stands.

Mr. CURTIS. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, on line 17 of the section as it stands I move to insert the words "twelve months subsequent to;" so that it shall read:

The application of no person for identification as a Mississippi Choctaw shall be received by said Commission after twelve months subsequent to the date of final ratification.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to ask the gentleman to make that six months. We want to close this matter up.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Very well; I will make it six months.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Kansas to withdraw his amendment temporarily?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; temporarily.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Now, the gentleman from Kansas offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 41 by adding thereto, as a part of the last sentence, the following:

"and in the disposition of such applications all full-blood Choctaw Indians who had not moved to and made bona fide settlement in the Choctaw-Chickasaw country prior to June 28, 1898, shall be deemed to be Mississippi Choctaws, entitled to benefits under article 14 of the said treaty of September 27, 1830, and to identification as such by said Commission, but this direction or provision shall be deemed to be only a rule of evidence and shall not be invoked by or operate to the advantage of any applicant who is not of the full blood."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi offers the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of removal to the Indian Territory of full-blood Mississippi Choctaws and other Mississippi Choctaws duly identified under the provisions of this agreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, I want to say a few words upon the amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have to ask the gentleman to suspend. The special order under which we are proceeding this evening expressly directs that this session shall not extend beyond 10.30 p. m. That hour having arrived, the House stands adjourned until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 18, 1902.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. ALLISON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the Chair may lay before the Senate the concurrent resolution passed some days ago by the House of Representatives respecting the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution; which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 7, 1902.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. REBECCA J. TAYLOR.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I wish to call up the resolution I introduced several days ago concerning the discharge of Miss Rebecca J. Taylor from the classified service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee calls from the table the resolution which will be read to the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CARMACK on the 10th instant, as follows:

Whereas it appears that Rebecca J. Taylor, late a clerk in the War Department, holding a position in the classified service, was, by order of the Secretary of War, discharged from her position on the 7th day of June, 1902: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be instructed to inquire and report the reasons for such discharge and whether the same was made in accordance with law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I do not desire to make any extended remarks upon this question. I introduced this resolution because it appeared to me to involve a question of very considerable importance, not so much to the lady who seems to have been made the victim of the resentment of the powers that be, but because of its importance to a just and orderly and lawful conduct of the civil service of the Government.

On the 7th day of June, Miss Rebecca J. Taylor, a clerk in the War Department, in the classified service, received notice in the form of the following order:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 7, 1902.

Rebecca J. Taylor, clerk at $840 per annum in the Office of the Adjutant-General (temporary roll), is hereby discharged, to take effect this date.

By order of the Secretary of War:

That was all. It was simply a very plain, very curt, and very peremptory note of dismissal from the service.

Section 8 of rule 2 of the civil-service rules reads as follows:

No removal shall be made from the competitive classified service except for just cause and for reasons given in writing, and the person sought to be removed shall have notice and be furnished a copy of such reasons, and be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing. Copy of such reasons, notice, and answer and of the order of removal shall be made a part of the records of the proper department or office; and the reasons for any change in rank or compensation within the competitive classified service shall also be made a part of the records of the proper department or office.

It is true, sir, that there has been a subsequent modification of this rule by order of the President. That modification reads as follows:

Now, for the purpose of preventing all such misunderstandings and improper constructions of said section, it is hereby declared that the term "just cause," as used in section 8, Civil Service Rule II, is intended to mean any cause, other than one merely political or religious, which will promote the efficiency of the service; and nothing contained in said rule shall be construed to require the examination of witnesses or any trial or hearing except in the discretion of the officer making the removal.

Approved.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, May 29, 1902.

Now, Mr. President, if this modification was made for the purpose of reaching an antecedent offense committed by Miss Taylor and of putting the rule in such form that she could be discharged under it for some offense committed prior to the modification of the rule, then it deserves all the odium that properly attaches to an ex post facto law.

This modification seems to have been intended to practically nullify the old rule that was made by President McKinley, and to a very large extent it does so; but there is one part of the rule which still remains, that part of it which requires that the reasons for removal shall be in writing; that notice shall be given; that the person accused shall have a copy of such reasons and be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing. That still remains; it is still the law; and if in this case no charge has been made against Miss Taylor, if there has been no specification of any misconduct, of any fault, of any neglect of duty or inefficiency in the performance of duty, and if no reasons were given for her removal, then this law has been plainly and palpably and flagrantly violated.

Now, sir, it does not appear in the correspondence in reference to this case that there has been any charge made or that any notice has been served upon Miss Taylor, or any reasons given to her for her removal, or any opportunity to answer a charge thus formally made.

It is true that some days before her discharge a letter was addressed to her, asking whether or not she was the writer of a certain newspaper article, and her attention at the time was called to this rule.

Mr. President, that is not a compliance with either the letter or the spirit of the plain and mandatory provisions of this rule, which contemplates a formal written charge, clearly and explicitly stating the offense that has been committed, the reason why removal is contemplated, and an opportunity on the part of the person accused to make answer in the form of a denial or explanation or any other defense he may see proper to make.

The reason for this rule does not begin and end with its application to any particular case. It is required here that a—

Copy of such reasons, notice, answer, and of the order of removal shall be made a part of the records of the proper department or office.

It is intended to be a precedent. It is intended to be a rule for the future or an authoritative interpretation of some rule. It is intended to serve as a warning and instruction to all other clerks in the civil service of the Government, and it is, therefore, very important that the offense shall be clearly and explicitly stated, not only for the benefit of the person accused, but for the benefit of all other civil-service employees, in order that they may know what the offense is and govern their own conduct accordingly.

I say no offense has been charged in this case. Miss Taylor was simply asked, "Did you write a certain newspaper article?" By no reasonable construction whatever can that be interpreted to mean an accusation.

But suppose that, for all intents and purposes, simply asking the question, "Did you write a certain newspaper article?" was an accusation, a charge that she did write that newspaper article, is that any intelligent compliance with the spirit and meaning of this rule? Is it intended to mean that the writing of a newspaper article is an offense? Is that what is meant?

We must assume that it was not simply the writing of a newspaper article, but that there was something in the nature or in the contents of the article, although that is not stated. We have to gather it from inference, or just as a mere matter of common sense.

No man in this Chamber and no man in the United States can clearly and distinctly define, from the papers in this case, the offense for which Miss Taylor was discharged. It is not said she was accused of writing a certain newspaper arricle. Wherein is the offense? Is it something contained in the article? Is it something in the nature of the article, or is it simply the writing of an article for a newspaper?

Some of the extreme advocates of civil-service reform have contended that persons in the classified service should refrain from the discussion of all questions of party politics. Was it upon that theory that Miss Taylor was discharged? Was she discharged because she undertook to discuss a question of party politics without reference to the side she took in the controversy? No man can take this correspondence and say whether she was discharged simply for writing a newspaper article, and because the War Department does not permit its employees to write articles for the newspapers, or whether she was discharged for discussing a question of current party politics, or because there was something offensive contained in the article, or whether she was simply discharged because she took the wrong side of the Philippine question from the Administration point of view. What was it?

Suppose, Mr. President, she had written an article eulogizing the President and the Administration's policy. Suppose she had eulogized his Philippine policy. Suppose she had justified and defended all the atrocities that had been perpetrated in the Philippine Islands. Suppose she had defended and excused Smith. Suppose she had defended the use of torture and the wholesale burning of towns, and suppose she had said, with respect to these things, that such coercion "was absolutely inevitable in putting a stop to an armed attack upon the sovereignty of the United States." Suppose she had excused torture and the desolation of an entire province and the killing of little children. Suppose she had coupled with that the most vindictive and intemperate abuse and denunciation of all who opposed the policy of the Administration. Suppose she had said that United States Senators ought to be hanged for opposing and criticising the conduct of the war in the Philippine Islands. Would she have been discharged for that? No man can know; no man can tell.

I believe the idea that will be conveyed to every other person in the civil service will be that it is not safe for any such clerk or any such employee to dissent from or criticise the policy of the Administration. I do not believe that the effect of that action will be to deter anybody at all from speaking as freely and as abusively and as intemperately as he may please of the opponents of the Administration.

So I say there is no interpretation of any rule to be drawn from this act of the War Department. No man can tell, no Senator can say to-day, for what particular offense this lady was discharged, and no clerk in the War Department will know how to govern his conduct in the future by reason of her dismissal except to refrain from expressing opinions contrary to the views and policy of the Administration.

Mr. President, I have some extracts from the report of the Civil Service Commission when President Roosevelt was a member of that Commission. The report of 1889-90 contains the following:

In the departmental service at Washington the figures show that the question of politics has been practically eliminated in making removals; for the last seven years the law as a whole has been faithfully and honestly observed. * * *

The Commission takes this opportunity to reiterate, however, its belief that, in cases where a removal is made, the appointing officer should give the accused man a chance to be heard in his own defense, and should be required to file in writing a full statement of his reasons for making the removal, such statement to be made public, if the accused so desire it.

* * * * * * *

EFFECTS OF INVESTIGATION.

A study of the above figures illustrates a fact which we have already repeatedly observed and commented on, namely, that where an appointing officer makes an excessive number of removals, or in any way disregards or evades the law at his office, he thereby demoralizes his successors and makes t di fficult to hold the latter to a strict accountability.

GREAT IMPROVEMENTS BROUGHT ABOUT BY THE MERIT SYSTEM.

It can not be too often reiterated that while the law may not work with ideal perfection, actual experience for seven years has shown that it produces on the whole a better governmental administration than does the patronage system. Moreover, what is more important, it immeasurably betters the tone of political life by making the mass of Government employees simply what they purport to be—that is, public servants and not adherents of the party in power, organized into disciplined bodies for its support, and straining every effort to secure its continuance and supremacy. It is noteworthy that the officers and bureaus which show the best results in giving an honest, efficient, and economical administration are precisely those in which the civil-service law has been most faithfully observed.

The merit system is the American system, the unaristocratic system, and no system could be less American and more undemocratic than the patronage system which it supplants.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
HUGH S. THOMPSON,
Commissioners.

(Civil Service Report, 1889-1890.)

I have some other extracts here which I will not read, but will ask to have printed with my remarks in the RECORD.

Under the spoils system the theory is that politics belong especially to the officeholders. Under the merit system the theory is that politics belong to the people, and that the people are quite capable of managing their own affairs without interference and dictation on the part of those who may have been chosen to serve the whole people in merely administrative positions.

* * * * * * *

While one of the main purposes of the law is to improve the public service, yet this can hardly be considered its main object. Its principal object is to remove from American politics the degrading influence of the patronage system.

* * * * * * *

The whole patronage system is inimical to American institutions; it forms one of the gravest problems with which democratic and republican governments have to grapple.

The merit system improves the governmental service as a mere administrative machine, and is of incalculable good in our political life. The cause of civil-service reform—that is, the cause of honest government and decent political life, the cause of Abraham Lincoln's "plain people"—as against the cause of that most noxious body, the oligarchy of professional officeholders and officeseekers, must go forward. There can be no halt, no truce. The bulk of the officers of the Government are purely administrative business officers. The post-officers, for instance, should, properly speaking, have nothing whatever to do with politics. The duty of the postmaster, postal clerks, and letter carriers is merely to see that the mails are expeditiously and safely delivered. The appointment and retention in office of each one should depend solely upon whether, in doing his duties, he serves the whole people, without distinction of parties, well and faithfully. His position should depend in no way upon his party predilections, for his capacity to perform his duties has not the slightest reference to his opinions upon the tariff, the currency, or any other of the great questions upon which parties divide.

There are properly very few of the offices in the gift of the Government which are really political in character after we pass below the highest, such as members of the Cabinet and the ministers to foreign countries. The duties of the bulk of Government officials have or should have no reference whatever to politics, and they should be divorced entirely from politics. No question before the American people to-day is so important as this question of working a thorough and radical reform of the civil service by separating it entirely from partisan politics, for no other reform so vitally affects the most important of all questions, the securing a pure and honest and an upright government.

CHARLES LYMAN,
THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
HUGH S. THOMPSON,
Commissioners.

(Civil Service Report, 1890-91.)

In the Civil Service Report for 1891–92, signed also by Theodore Roosevelt, we have the following:

The Commission has throughout the year steadily endeavored to raise still higher the standard of obedience to law.

In the civil-service report for 1893–94 is the following:

While the civil-service law does not in terms regulate dismissals from the service, it does provide a system for appointment upon merit in which consideration ofs politics and religion find no place, being excluded in definite and specific terms. This being the case with reference to appointments to the service, it follows as a logical sequence that politics should and rightfully can have nothing to do with continuance in and exit from the service. Unfortunately in many cases the facts have been otherwise, and the Commission is fully convinced that to some extent religious and political considerations will influence dismissals until there is a requirement of law or rule that not only shall the reasons for dismissal be made a matter of record, and be made known to the person to be dismissed, but that he also be given an opportunity to be heard in his own defense.

In this line is a practice lately introduced by the Postmaster-General in the postal service. In the circular introducing the new practice he says: "For the purpose of avoiding unjust removals of clerks and carriers in the classified service * * * no carrier shall be removed except for cause and upon written charges filed with the Post-Office Department and of which the carrier shall have full notice and an opportunity to make defense." * * *

This is in striking contrast to the practice that prevailed previously in the Post-Office service and that now generally obtains in other branches of the service. So far as results are known to the Commission, the practice introduced by the Postmaster-General is working well and in the direction of security, stability, and efficiency in the service and undoubtedly toward the complete elimination of politics therefrom.

It has been often claimed, and with some show of reason, that any interference with the arbitrary power of removal, even to the extent of requiring reasons to be stated and giving the accused a hearing, would weaken the discipline and impair the efficiency of the service. The Commission has never believed this to be true, but the contrary, and it is convinced that its belief will find a complete justification in the postal service. What promises so well in that service, in the judgment of the Commission, might safely and without fear of evil consequences be applied to all branches of the classified service.

POLITICAL DISCRIMINATIONS.

Partisan feeling and bias often show themselves in the service in discriminations in favor of the adherents of one party and against those of another, not only in the matter of dismissals, but also in connection with promotions and reductions. The most common form of this discrimination in connection with dismissals is to dismiss employees of one political faith for offenses which are allowed to pass unnoticed or with slight reprimand by employees of the opposite political faith.

CHARLES LYMAN,
THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
Commissioners.

(Civil Service Report 1893-94.)

In the civil-service report for 1896–97—Mr. Roosevelt was not then a member of the Commission—the Commissioners quote the new section added to rule 2—that is the one which has just been modified by President Roosevelt—and they say:

No removal shall be made from any position subject to competitive examination except for just cause and upon written charges filed with the head of department or other appointing officer and of which the accused shall have full notice and opportunity to make defense.

Relative to this section the report states:

This is one of the most important orders made since the enactment of the law and has met the entire approval of the public. * * * While not impairing the prompt exercise of power of discipline, this amendment guards the service against abuse, lessens the temptation to make improper removals, and affords a just degree of protection to the employee and a greater security and permanence in office during good behavior.

Civil-service report for 1897-98, after quoting said section, states: "This rule is one of the most important ever issued relating to executive civil service, and, after a full year's operation, has met the hearty approval of the public and of most of the executive officers of the Government."

Subsequent reports have emphasized these statements. Here the President of the United States has so modified that rule as to practically nullify it, to practically destroy all its beneficent qualities and all its beneficent effects. The rule has been practically abrogated, except for the one feature which requires that the reason shall be given; so that the person may be discharged for any reason whatever that the appointing officer may choose to assign, except it be for political or religious reasons. In this case the clerk was, in fact, discharged because she wrote an article giving her views on certain political questions.

Mr. President, I have some articles here—some from the Washington Post and one from the Chicago Public—which I wish to put in the RECORD at this time.

The articles referred to are as follows:

[From the Washington Post.]

AT COST OF HER PLACE—MISS TAYLOR USED PEN IN CRITICISM OF PRESIDENT—ATTACKED PHILIPPINE POLICY—SUMMARILY DISCHARGED AT NOON ON SATURDAY AFTER HAVING SOME DAYS BEFORE ADMITTED THE AUTHORSHIP OF AN OBJECTIONABLE ARTICLE—DISMISSAL COMES UNDER LATEST CIVIL-SERVICE RULING.

Miss Rebecca J. Taylor, of the temporary force of clerks of the War Department who were recently placed in the classified service by act of Congress, received notice of her dismissal on Saturday. She was appointed to the position from Minnesota in January, 1899, and was employed in the record and printing division at a salary of $840 per annum. The formal order of dismissal, dated June 7, reached her at noon and took effect at once. It did not permit her to finish the day's work.

Miss Taylor, who is a very talented woman, has been a most earnest opponent of the war in the Philippines and an unsparing critic of our policy toward the natives. She has contributed frequently for two years or more to the page in the Monday issues of the Post devoted to the "Views of the People on Timely Topics." Her communications, which invariably bore her name, were written in good, strong English, and always attracted attention. One of them, a few months ago, dealing with the Philippine situation, was read in the House by a Democratic member and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In addition to her communication to the Post, Miss Taylor about two years ago issued a pamphlet concerning the Philippines, which gave official records in chronological order and was a severe arraignment of the Administration. This publication, like all her writings, gave her name as the author. If it was ever brought to the attention of the President or Secretary of War at that time it was ignored.

CRITICISED THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The immediate cause of Miss Taylor's discharge was a communication printed in the Post on May 12, in which she took up the President's speech to the Sons of the American Revolution on "The Flag Shall Stay Put." She criticised especially that part of the speech which proposed a toast to our gallant soldiers fighting in the Eastern Tropics. This article from Miss Taylor's pen was regarded by many readers as intemperate, and was roundly condemned, but others—the anti-imperialists sharing the views expressed—gave warm approval to the article.

Miss Taylor, it is understood, was asked several days ago by the chief of her division, by direction of the Secretary, whether she was the author of the communication. This was but a mere official formality, as her name was attached to the article and the authorship was well understood. Her dismissal, however, did not follow at once.

The statement was made last night that the real cause of Miss Taylor's dismissal was a letter she had written to Secretary Root when she was asked whether she was the author of the article in the Post.

It was reported about the Department that the civil-service ruling by the President a few days ago was made expressly to cover Miss Taylor's case, but this is denied. The ruling, it is explained, was made to reach certain employees of the New York custom-house, who are under suspicion, but against whom proof is lacking. It is as follows:

CIVIL-SERVICE RULING.

"Whereas certain misunderstandings have existed in regard to the proper construction of section 8 of the Civil-Service Rule II, which provides as follows:

"'No removal shall be made from the competitive classified service except for just cause and for reasons given in writing; and the person sought to be removed shall have notice and be furnished a copy of such reasons, and be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing. Copy of such reasons, notice, and answer, and of the order of removal shall be made a part of the records of the proper department or office; and the reasons for any change in rank or compensation within the competitive classified service shall also be made a part of the records of the proper department or office.'

"Now, for the purpose of preventing all such misunderstandings and improper constructions of said section, it is hereby declared that the term 'just cause,' as used in section 8, Civil-Service Rule II, is intended to mean any cause, other than one merely political or religious, which will promote the efficiency of the service; and nothing contained in said rule shall be construed to require the examination of witnesses or any trial or hearing except in the discretion of the officer making the removal.

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

"WHITE HOUSE.
"Approved, May 29, 1902."

DECLINED TO MAKE A STATEMENT.

Miss Taylor when seen yesterday declined to make any statement, but appeared to be accepting her dismissal philosophically. She would not say whether she intended to take any step to test the right to remove her. Her convictions as to the Philippine war are deep-rooted and will be strengthened, no doubt, by the punishment thus meted out to her. She is an earnest, modest little woman, who is held in high personal esteem by all who know her. She was appointed to the position in the War Department at the instance of Representative MCCLEARY, from whose State she comes, though she is a native of Wisconsin. While he does not approve her Philippine opinions, he does not hesitate to speak of her as a very conscientious woman.

Following is the full text of the article, printed four weeks ago, which led to Miss Taylor's peremptory dismissal:

THE FLAG "SHALL STAY PUT"—PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S TRIBUTE TO THE "SPLENDID WORK" DONE IN PHILIPPINES.

EDITOR POST: In the face of the official Philippine horrors that are being disclosed, horrors which have been perpetrated with the knowledge and by the command of the military authorities in the islands, the American people will read with dismay that at the recent banquet of the Sons of the American Revolution the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, "drank to the health of the soldiers and sailors of the present day, who during the last three years have done such splendid work in the inconceivably dangerous and harassing warfare of the Eastern Tropics."

Without an uncivilized mode of warfare during the last three years the "splendid work" could never have been accomplished. The struggle for liberty would still be going on in Samar had not "the soldiers of the present day" done that "splendid work" of creating a "howling wilderness." Are we to interpret the expression of the President as approval of the official barbarities committed in the Philippines the past three years? There is abundant proof that the barbarities began with the war, only increasing in degree, growing "stiffer and stiffer," as General Hughes testified, until the "splendid" work is nearing completion.

If the work done was "spendid," the workers may not be classed as "wrongdoers," subject to punishment. But should such become a political necessity, a Chaffee-Smith-Bell-Hughes-Waller-Funston scapegoat will not appease the sense of justice of the American people. They will demand the political lives of those in authority who place the seal of approval upon the diabolical work these human bloodhounds have accomplished.

What is this "splendid work" that has been done in the Tropics? The glory, if glory it be, died with the booming of Dewey's last cannon. Our Army officers surrendered all claim to honor by carrying on a policy of deception and trickery, which began as soon as the Army disembarked upon Philippine soil. Failing by such means, they have operated under double-distilled Spanish methods until the United States counts more victims in three years than Spain dispatched in three centuries.

Is it "splendid work" to hold up a people and rob them of country and nationality at the point of the bayonet? Is it "splendid work" to turn the cannon upon allies because they decline to yield their inalienable rights? Is it a "splendid work" to sweep thousands from the earth because they take up arms in defense of home and liberty? Is it a "splendid work" to apply the torch to the homes of earth while helpless women and babes and tottering age flee before the flames that blot out those hallowed spots? Is it a "splendid work" to make God's fair isles a "howling wilderness?" Is it a "splendid work" to slay the wounded on the battlefield, to spare no prisoners of war, but to make them a target of a three days' shooting match?

Is it a "splendid work" to choose by lot an innocent person—a prisoner of war—and execute him for the crime of another? Is it a "splendid work" to torture human beings until, racked with pain, writhing in agony, frenzied with anguish, the will power shattered, they admit anything charged, however false, to gain a moment's respite? Is it a "splendid work" to exterminate a people by murdering noncombatants, "all over 10 years of age," leaving the remnant to the horrors of starvation? All these facts are in evidence. They have been admitted by the official perpetrators. Is this the way "strong men, not weaklings," prove their strength? This is the strength, not of men, but of demons.

Oh, what "splendid work," what valor, what heroism, what magnificent courage "the gallant Americans, wearing the uniform of the American Republic," displayed. How "gloriously have they upheld the most glorious traditions of the past," as, protected by a moving breastwork of enforced Filipino citizens, they swept forward, armed to the teeth, to valiantly battle against those fierce Malay warriors, Filipino boys of 8 and 10 years, come out to defend the honor of their mothers, if, perchance, they escaped the brutal massacre—come forth to avenge the slaughter of their sires and the murder of their brothers, whose lifeblood drenched the soil of their native land. What "inconceivably dangerous and harassing warfare of the Eastern Tropics" was this for "the soldier of the present day."

How flattered must be the survivors of the Grand Army of the Republic, how exalted the military giants "wearing the blue and the gray," how elated the Sons of the American Revolution, whose ancestors fell at Lexington and fought at Bunker Hill, and left the prints of their bleeding feet upon the snows of Valley Forge—what world-wide fame to have their names coupled with "those gallant (?) Americans" disgracing "the uniform of the American Republic" in the Philippines.

Long will Theodore Roosevelt drink to the health of those who wrought the "splendid work" of death ere the spirit of liberty shall be crushed from the souls of the infant heroes of the Philippines, but not till the land is left desolate, not while humanity lives in the American heart, not till the doctrine of the brotherhood of man dies in Christendom, not until God forgets His brown children, will the flag "stay put" on the blood-soaked soil of the Philippines. Eternal shame on such ignoble warfare.

REBECCA J. TAYLOR.

AN ERRONEOUS REPORT.

There is absolutely no truth in the report circulated yesterday that Miss Taylor was dismissed because of a suspicion that she had furnished to Senator Culberson the official record in the Arnold case, which made a suspect of General Miles.

[From the Washington Post.]

CASE OF MISS TAYLOR—RESOLUTION OF INQUIRY IS OFFERED IN CONGRESS—ASKS CAUSE OF HER DISMISSAL—CIVIL-SERVICE ASPECTS OF THE MATTER ATTRACT SOME ATTENTION—COPIES OF THE OFFICIAL PAPERS FURNISHED BY THE DISCHARGED CLERK, WHO FORMALLY ENTERS PROTEST AGAINST TREATMENT RECEIVED.

The case of Miss Rebecca J. Taylor, of Minnesota, who was summarily dismissed from her position in the War Department because, in a communication in the Post, she criticised the speech made by the President to the Sons of the American Revolution, praising the work of our military forces in the Philippines, has been taken up in Congress. Representative Shallenberger, Democrat, of Nebraska, a member of the House Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, after conferring with several of his colleagues, yesterday introduced the following:

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, respectfully requested to communicate to the House of Representatives the cause and reasons for the dismissal of Rebecca J. Taylor from her position in the classified service in the War Department, if not incompatible with the interests of the public business."

COMMENT AT THE CAPITOL.

Without discussion the resolution was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. Representative GILLETT of Massachusetts is chairman of this committee. It is not unlikely that the resolution will be reported for passage. The case has attracted attention at the Capitol. Some members think that Miss Taylor was dealt with rather too harshly, and others are are of the opinion that it was shortsighted policy to give any attention whatever to her letter, as the contrary action naturally gave the widest publicity to the views she expressed. Generally speaking, the Republican members who made any comment thought that a Government clerk who commented so sharply upon the utterances of the President deserved at least a warning or reprimand. Suggestions have been made that it might be well were Miss Taylor restored to the classified service and suspended for two or three months without pay. This comes from men who fear that the action of the War Department may cause serious criticism.

RECORD IN THE CASE.

It is very evident that Miss Taylor intends to insist upon what she believes to be her rights under the law. She again declined yesterday to make any statement of her intentions, but gave to the press copies of the papers in the case. She said the record would speak for itself. It is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 27, 1902.

SIR: The Secretary of War directs that Miss Rebecca J. Taylor, temporary clerk in your office, be called upon for a statement as to whether or not she is the author of the letter published in The Washington Post of May 12, 1902, under the heading "The flag shall stay put," as shown in the accompanying clipping.

If Miss Taylor acknowledges the authorship of this letter, her attention should be invited to section 8 of Civil Service Rule II, and under the provisions of that rule she should be given three days in which to make any explanation or statement in writing that she may desire to submit in regard to the matter.

Very respectfully, JOHN C. SCHOFIELD,
Chief Clerk.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
United States Army.

The chief of the division in which Miss Taylor was employed indorses the foregoing as follows:

Respectfully referred to Miss Rebecca J. Taylor for the report called for by the Secretary of War.

Section 8 of Civil Service Rule No. II, referred to within, reads as follows:

"8. No removal shall be made from the competitive classified service except for just cause and for reasons given in writing; and the person sought to be removed shall have notice and be furnished a copy of such reasons, and be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing. Copy of such reasons, notice, and answer, and order of removal, shall be made a part of the records of the proper department or office, and the reasons for any change in rank or compensation within the competitive classified service shall also be made a part of the records of the proper department or office.

"R. P. THIAN.

"ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, May 28, 1902."

ADMITTED THE AUTHORSHIP.

Within the three days allowed her, Miss Taylor returned the paper with this indorsement:

"Respectfully returned, with the information that I am the author of the letter published in the Washington Post of May 12, 1902, under the heading 'The flag shall stay put.'

"Referring to the explanation or statement called for by the Secretary of War, I have the honor to state that not being a temporary clerk, but having been placed within the classified service by act of Congress, having transgressed no civil-service rule, and having received no notice to that effect, nor that 'removal' is 'sought' for 'just cause,' or otherwise, neither any 'reason' therefor, therefore I have not been furnished the conditions upon which to base an explanation or statement; in fact, I am unable to determine the nature of the 'explanation or statement' called for from the communication submitted.

"If the proper authorities will submit 'notice' and 'reasons in writing,' in compliance with section 8, civil-service rule No. 2, I shall be pleased to consider the privilege of 'answering the same in writing,' as permitted by section 8, civil-service rule No. 2.

"I respectfully submit that it is unusual, to say the least, for an individual to plead either innocent or guilty, or to offer a defense when no charge has been preferred.

"Respectfully, REBECCA J. TAYLOR."

On May 29 the President issued the civil-service order relative to section 8, quoted above, as follows:

"Now, for the purpose of preventing all such misunderstandings and improper constructions of said section, it is hereby declared that the term 'just cause,' as used in section 8, civil-service rule 2, is intended to mean any cause, other than one merely political or religious, which will promote the efficiency of the service, and nothing contained in said rule shall be construed to require the examination of witnesses or any trial or hearing except in the discretion of the officer making the removal."

DISMISSAL AND PROTEST.

This order was published on June 4 and Miss Taylor received notice of her dismissal three days later, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 7, 1902.

Rebecca J. Taylor, clerk at $840 per annum in the Office of the Adjutant-General (temporary roll), is hereby discharged, to take effect this date.

By order of the Secretary of War:

Yesterday Miss Taylor prepared the following and mailed it to the War Department:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 9, 1902.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of June 7, 1902, purporting to be an order of discharge from the classified service of the War Department. This order does not comply with the provisions of the civil service, rule 2, section 8, as follows:

"No removal shall be made from the competitive classified service except for just cause and for reasons given in writing, and the person sought to be removed shall have notice and be furnished a copy of such reasons, and be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing."

I was not furnished the "reasons given in writing," explaining the "just cause" for the alleged removal. To this I was entitled, and I therefore protest against this alleged order as illegal.

I hereby declare that I am and at all times since the receipt of said alleged order of discharge have been willing and have held myself in readiness to perform the duties of my office, and that I will report for duty whenever notified.

Respectfully, REBECCA J. TAYLOR.

[From The Public, Chicago, June 14.]

This Executive interpretation seems to have been made to fit the case of Miss Rebecca J. Taylor, a clerk in the merit class of the War Department. Miss Taylor has opinions of her own on the great political, not to say religious, questions of the past four years. She does not believe in imperialism, she does not believe in military conquest and cruelty, and she is not in harmony with the idea of the President that when the flag is put anywhere "it must stay put."

Miss Taylor has not allowed her views on these questions to interfere with her clerical duties at the War Department. No objection whatever is made to her qualifications and performances as a War Department clerk. But it appears that out of office hours, instead of playing ping pong, she wrote articles on the Philippine question which the Washington Post published. One of these articles was reproduced two weeks ago in our miscellany department (page 125). It was a well-considered criticism of President Roosevelt's "stay-put" speech. Not in the slightest degree indicative of unfitness in the writer as a clerk, the article could have given legitimate official offense only upon some "lezé-majesty" doctrine.

But it appears to have given to the President and the Secretary of War such offense, legitimate or illegitimate, that they have chucked—no other word describes it—Miss Taylor out of her clerical chair and into the street. Without a hearing, without a complaint of any kind, without the slightest reference to the Civil-Service Commission, without the observance of any of the safeguards of the merit system, without pretense of conduct prejudicial to her official duties, but simply upon the President's order modifying the civil-service rules, they handed her a notice of dismissal in the middle of the day, and requested her to vacate her desk immediately. If this is in harmony with the merit system of civil service, one might ask how the merit system differs from the spoils system. It is certainly not distinguishable in method.

When civil-service reformers were agitating for the merit system the burden of their argument, as applied to clerkships, was something like this: What the Government needs is a clerk. The clerk's views on public policy makes no difference. Whether he believes in protection or free trade, or in gold or silver or greenback money, does not concern the public service. What does concern the public service is the clerk's efficiency, industry, and fidelity as a clerk. If he is a satisfactory clerk the good of the service demands his retention, no matter how heterodox his opinions may be. The same argument might have been properly extended so as to include just such a case as Miss Taylor's.

It would have been asked what difference it makes how Miss Taylor views the Philippine question, what difference how she views the water torture in the Philippines, what difference how she regards Mr. Roosevelt's "stay-put" speech, what difference how or where she expresses her opinions, provided she expresses them not as a War Department clerk but as a citizen, and does not encroach thereby upon the hours, the energies, or the fidelity which as a clerk she owes to—no, not to Mr. Roosevelt or the Secretary of War, whom she has offended, or the imperialist policy which she condemns, but to the Government that employs her? We are not criticizing Mr. Roosevelt for thus punishing a Government clerk who has been bold enough to disagree with him publicly on a political question, nor for knocking the backbone out of the merit system by his executive interpretation. He may possibly be right in both particulars. But he can not be right in either and be right also in the civil-service doctrines he professes. Either in his civil-service practice or in his civil-service principles, one or the other, he is wrong.

[The Washington Post, June 14, 1902.]

A LONG STEP BACKWARD.

Is the merit system destined to fatal impairment at the hands of an Administration that was confidently expected to strengthen and expand it? That system is far more dependent upon executive favor than any other feature or branch of the public service. The Pendleton Act of 1883, commonly called the civil-service law, undertook the accomplishment of an extremely delicate and difficult task in prescribing rules and regulations for appointments to and promotions in the civil service.

It was legislation in the executive sphere, for the Constitution placed the whole matter of appointments, promotions, and discharges in the hands of the executive department. Statutory enactments can not nullify constitutional provisions. It was evident at the beginning of agitation for reform in the civil service, long before the advent of Senator Pendleton's bill, that something in the nature of a waiver of executive prerogative would be indispensable to the success of the reform movement. The system inaugurated by the act of 1883 is far more largely a thing of Executive orders than of statutory enactments. Each succeeding President from Arthur to Cleveland, both inclusive, has contributed to the structure, and each has found it more firmly intrenched in popular confidence than did his predecessor.

As defects have been revealed or abuses have come to light, Executive orders have been applied as corrections and generally with a fair degree of success. One of the worst abuses was arbitrary removals from office of persons holding positions in the classified service. No one could question the constitutional right of the President to make such removals. On the other hand, it was clear that the exercise of that right was inconsistent with the theory of the merit system. A partisan Administration, an Administration that contemned the new way and preferred the spoils system, might make a clean sweep of all the Democrats or all the Republicans in the service without violating a letter of the civil-service law. Arbitrary discharges would suffice to run them out, and deft manipulation of the appointing machinery—such as was seen in 1885, when original reformers were running that machinery—would bring in the desired material. To remove this danger President McKinley promulgated section 8 of the Civil Service Rule II, thus:

"No removal shall be made from the competitive classified service except for just cause and for reasons given in writing; and the person sought to be removed shall have notice and be furnished a copy of such reasons, and be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing. Copy of such reasons, notice, and answer, and of the order of removal shall be made a part of the records of the proper department or office; and the reasons for any change in rank or compensation within the competitive classified service shall also be made a part of the records of the proper department or office."

On the 29th ultimo President Roosevelt promulgated a ruling which reads thus:

"Now, for the purpose of preventing all such misunderstandings and improper constructions of said section, it is hereby declared that the term 'just cause,' as used in section 8, civil-service rule II, is intended to mean any cause, other than one merely political or religious, which will promote the efficiency of the service; and nothing contained in said rule shall be construed to require the examination of witnesses or any trial or hearing except in the discretion of the officer making the removal."

A square repeal or rescinding of the McKinley rule would have been more frank and not less destructive than that emasculatory mutilation. There is now no defense whatever against arbitrary removal of either the retail or the wholesale kind. The one great contribution of President McKinley to the merit system is virtually annulled. A long step backward has been taken by an Administration whose face was supposed to be set in the opposite direction.

"LESE MAJESTE"—MISS TAYLOR'S CASE INDICATES THAT EUROPEAN WAYS ARE BEING INTRODUCED.

EDITOR POST: The dismissal of Miss Taylor from public service by order of the Secretary of War is an act of petty tyranny unworthy of our Government and bound to prove a boomerang to the Administration. The idea of warring with a clerk, and a woman at that, for having, in common with other citizens, an opinion! That is not the way to crush criticism. On the contrary, it will increase it and create spmpathy where oblivion would have resulted.

There seems to be a feeling of sycophantic subserviency in certain official circles.

We are still Americans, free born, and claim the inalienable privilege of thinking and expressing the thoughts that lie uppermost. These may not always fit in the grooves and niches of bureaucracy, but they suit many who are patriotic and thoroughly American.

If I were Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, I would promptly restore Miss Taylor, and thus win back the good opinion forfeited by her dismissal.

I do not wish to be understood as sympathizing or concurring in the judgment of Miss Taylor. Far from it. I believe in the Army and Navy of the United States; I honestly believe that they have done their full duty, and that the President has eulogized them fairly and justly, and, therefore, we can afford to be generous to opponents and critics and not inaugurate European measures of "lese majeste."

The remedy is a thousand times worse than the disease.

SIMON WOLF.

WASHINGTON, June 11.

Mr. CARMACK. Here is a recent interview with Miss Taylor, which I will read:

INTERVIEW WITH MISS REBECCA J. TAYLOR.

Miss Taylor was seen last evening and, being asked if there were any developments in her case, said there was nothing new for publication, and added, "I understand that the Secretary of War is out of the city."

Miss Taylor's attention being called to the President's new ruling on the civil service, issued just prior to her removal, she said, "Yes; there is something peculiar if not amusing about the President's second thought. Now, the old rule says, 'No removal shall be made from the competitive classified service except for just cause and for reasons given in writing.' Finding such a limitation embarrassing just at this time, he issued the order to which you refer, and which reads thus:

"'Now, for the purpose of preventing all such misunderstandings and improper constructions of said section, it is hereby declared that the term "just cause," as used in section 8, civil-service Rule II, is intended to mean any cause, other than one merely political or religious, which will promote the efficiency of the service, and nothing contained in said rule shall be construed to require the examination of witnesses or any trial or hearing except in the discretion of the officer making the removal.

"'THEODORE ROOSEVELT.'

"Now, to me this order is an enigma. Its meaning is incomprehensible. You see that as something which a clerk has done is supposed to be the cause of removal, it strikes me as being curious that a clerk should be removed for a cause which will promote the efficiency of the service. A clerk's act is at least the alleged cause of removal; therefore if it be admitted that his act promotes the efficiency of the service, he ought to demand retention or immediate restoration, as I do now on the President's own showing.

"For if the efficiency of the service is the thing that is desirable, why should a clerk be removed for a cause which will promote it? I can understand why a clerk might be removed for a cause which hinders the efficiency of the service, which prevents its efficiency, which diminishes its efficiency, which impedes and obstructs its efficiency, which retards its efficiency, which interferes with its efficiency, which precludes and estops its efficiency, which hampers and baffles and trammels its efficiency, which defeats and frustrates its efficiency, which stands in the way of its efficiency, but why on earth should anybody, however strenuous, wish to remove an employee for a cause which promotes the efficiency of the service? Ought not such a clerk to "stay put?" If a clerk ought to be removed for any cause which promotes the efficiency of the service, it seems as if a clerk ought to be promoted for any cause which increases the inefficiency of the service. And then, dear me! His Excellency issued this order "for the purpose of preventing all misunderstandings and improper constructions."

"Now, if I were president—of a college—and wished to expel a girl from one of the lower classes who had criticised me, I would issue an order to effect that purpose so correct and pellucid in its English that it would not say exactly the opposite of what I intended to express."

This is all that I have to say.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. SPOONER obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to direct the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to two points in connection with this proposed legislation on which I should like to hear him express himself in the course of his remarks to-day in such way as he sees fit.

It has been said that when the New French Panama Canal Company acquired the right from the old company to construct a canal, it was done with the understanding that 60 per cent of the profits resulting from the canal were to go to the old company, and that if the United States should construct the canal under the rights to be acquired from the French company, it would do so subject to this burden. I have heard the matter discussed in different ways. My own impression is that there is nothing in it, but I should like to hear the Senator from Wisconsin on that point, if he sees fit to speak on it.

The other point on which I should like to hear the Senator is a charge which has been made for a long while, which I confess at one time made a very great impression upon my own mind—a charge repeated by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] yesterday in his speech—that the purpose of the introduction of the Panama scheme into this discussion was not to provide for the building of a canal, but was to prevent the building of a canal. I am very earnestly in favor of a canal being built, and I believe it is the duty of every member of the Senate to vote for the construction of a canal on the best location that can be found. I would vote for no proposition, however, that I thought would impede or retard the building of a canal.

After a commission has been appointed, consisting of nine eminent men, whose duty it was to carefully investigate the ground of both these locations and of others and to report to Congress the facts they ascertained and their opinion—when this commission unanimously report in favor of the Panama Canal, I confess I am not willing to brush aside that unanimous report except for substantial reasons; but I would not vote for that report or for the Panama Canal if there were in my mind any doubt as to the good faith of the movement in favor of building the canal at Panama.

I shall be glad to hear the Senator from Wisconsin discuss these two points, because I think they are exceedingly important in their bearing upon this question.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I could not discuss this subject at all—and I do not intend to discuss it with great elaboration—without paying attention, which I shall very frankly do, to the matters suggested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

No one can overstate the importance of the subject. The construction of a canal connecting the two oceans, has been for many, many years the dream of statesmen, and the prayer of mariners. It is a colossal enterprise; and one which I believe the people of the United States, with less division of sentiment than I have ever known upon any other subject, desire shall be inaugurated and carried forward as speedily as consists with the public interest; a great public work to stand forever—as long as the Government stands. And, Mr. President, as the years go on, it obviously is to become more and more important to the country and its commerce, to the world, if the world shall use it, and to the commerce of the world.

He would be a very reckless and bold man who should attempt to set a limit upon what a hundred years from now will be our population, our wealth, and the extent of our commerce; and, Mr. President, no higher or more solemn duty, in my judgment, ever rested upon men in public position—as this work is to subserve not simply the purposes of commerce, but to promote the defense of the nation—than rests upon the Congress to reach the wisest possible conclusion upon this subject. It is too broad to be affected by sectionalism; it is a project of the whole country and of the whole people for all time, and it is not to be belittled, Mr. President, or it should not be, by action governed by mere sentiment, by prejudice, or by assumed local interest.

If there ever was a question to the solution of which ought to be brought the broadest views from a national standpoint, to my mind this is that problem. I have not supposed it could be debated, that what the people of the United States expect of us and demand of us and have a right to receive from us, is the wisest solution of this question, to the best of our ability, unfettered by any extraneous considerations. The people are to build this canal, they are to maintain it, and it is not debatable that they wish, and they are entitled to have the best canal route.

It has seemed to be considered by some Senators evidence of disloyalty to the project of an isthmian canal that an amendment has been offered to this bill, or proposed to be offered to it, projecting into the discussion consideration of the Panama route. In other words, it seems to have been thought novel, rather unjustified, and necessarily, therefore, with ulterior purpose, that the Senate did not find itself ready unanimously to adopt without debate the bill known as the Hepburn bill, which lies upon our table, providing for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal. I am quite unable to find any foundation or justification for that suggestion.

There was a time when, in speaking of an isthmian canal, no one in this country thought of any canal but the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. That was before Grant's time, then.

Mr. SPOONER. I am speaking within my own experience. They considered all these routes in the past; they considered the Panama route once; they have considered the Nicaragua route, and they have considered other routes, but I have not been able to see that the bewildering collection of statements and opinions and statistics as to the history of all the routes and all the projets of this sort, illumine in any degree the problem which is presented to the Senate. When I was before a member of this body I voted for a bill advocated by my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and by Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, under which it was hoped that the Nicaragua Canal would be constructed. When I read that bill from the standpoint of to-day, I wonder how I could have voted for it just as it was drawn. I voted during my present term in the Senate for a bill which was intended to promote the construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

For years the Panama Canal was so enveloped with the thick fog of scandal as not to be perceptible to the people of the United States and as to be considered entirely out of the question. How does it come to us to-day? In 1899 Congress passed a law making it the duty of the President to—> make a full and complete investigation of the Isthmus of Panama with a view to the construction of a canal by the United States across the same to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans; that the President is authorized to make investigation of any and all practicable routes for a canal across said Isthmus of Panama, and particularly to investigate the two routes known respectively as the Nicaraguan route and the Panama route—> with a view to determining the most practicable and feasible route for such canal.

I have never heard that law criticised. I believe it commended itself to the American people as a sensible proposition made in their obvious interest, the inspiration of it being to secure, through adequate investigation by fit men, an examination of the various routes and a report to the President and to the Congress of that route which possessed the greatest relative merit and advantage.

Does anyone say that after the enactment of that law we were only to look at the Nicaragua route; that thereafter the people did not expect us to act upon the report of the investigation inaugurated under our command by the President at an expense of a million dollars? That law was passed in order that there might be presented to Congress a comparison of routes, and in order that Congress might choose for this great work, which is to be perpetual, that one which all in all seems to be the best.

The President did not appoint on this Commission lawyers or laymen. He did not fill it with members of Congress or ex-members of Congress. He did what, of course, it was expected he would do, and what it was his duty to do. He chose experts in the science and practice of engineering—men of skill in that great profession, a profession which, with the lapse of years, has made as great strides in progress as any other. He created this Commission, composed of Rear-Admiral Walker; Hon. Samuel Pasco, an ex-Senator and an able lawyer, who was to perform the functions of a lawyer on this Commission; Mr. George S. Morison; Lieut. Col. Oswald H. Ernst, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; Lewis M. Haupt, C. E.; Alfred Noble, C. E.; Col. Peter C. Hains, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; William H. Burr, C. E., and Prof. Emory R. Johnson, all eminent men.

Is the personnel of that Commission criticised? Is it impeached here as to integrity, ability, or engineering skill?

Everybody knew that this problem is one of infinite complication from the engineering standpoint; everybody knew, who thought about it, that the object of this Commission and of its creation was to lay before Congress data and opinions of experts in order that the Congress might proceed conservatively and wisely. The mind of the people then was not focused simply on Nicaragua; they were taking a larger view of this subject; and from the time the Commission was appointed it has not been a question of a canal—we all want that—but a question of which route should be chosen. I take it that the people of the United States are determined to have a canal.

If the majority of the Senate believe that the Nicaragua route is the route, they will so vote; if they believe that the Panama route, if it can be obtained, is the better route, they will so vote, each Senator discharging, of course, his own duty and acting, of course, upon his own responsibility.

Mr. President, this Commission went about its work and proceeded with it methodically, with great labor. They went abroad; they studied the general subject of ship canals; they investigated the maps, the profiles, the history, and everything connected with the New Panama Canal Company and its property. They went over the ground on the isthmus. They studied the situation there in every detail as they studied the Nicaragua route in detail.

I propose to make no argument here against the practicability of the Nicaraguan route, for I have offered a substitute for the pending bill, based upon the unanimous recommendation of the Commission, that the Panama route is the better for the United States——

Mr. MORGAN. To which recommendation does the Senator refer?

Mr. SPOONER. The recommendations of both reports are entirely consistent.

Mr. MORGAN. I just wanted to know to which one the Senator referred.

Mr. SPOONER. I will explain that as I go along.

Both reports are entirely consistent; and the proposition which I have made here is that, if the President can obtain satisfactory title to the Panama Canal and the requisite concessions from Colombia, that canal is to be constructed as the Isthmian Canal of the United States; and that if within a reasonable time the President can not obtain a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company, or if he can secure that and can not within a reasonable time secure the requisite concessions from Colombia, and the President can then secure the requisite concessions from Nicaragua and Costa Rica, he is to proceed to construct the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him——

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. If I understand the Senator's statement, his proposition does not confer upon the President any discretion to make a choice between these routes?

Mr. SPOONER. It was not intended to do so, but I will get to that. As the Senator said the other day, criticising the proposition, I say now that it was not intended to confer upon the President the power to select the route. I have not thought it a proper thing to do to put that responsibility upon the President of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I agree with the Senator on that, but the whole country and the Senate have been under the impression that the Senator's substitute was intended to confer a discretionary power upon the President, and I am glad he has made the correction.

Mr. SPOONER. Any man who read the substitute would see that that is not true.

Mr. MORGAN. Men do not read things nowadays; they guess at them, and read statements of them in the newspapers.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not responsible for that.

Mr. MORGAN. Neither am I.

Mr. SPOONER. I think Congress ought to choose the route, Mr. President, and I think Congress will choose the route.

Mr. President, I have been diverted a little from the line which I intended to pursue. I think I am perfectly safe in saying that the Commission unanimously, with perhaps one qualification, recommend the Panama route.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not wish to controvert the statement of the Senator while he has the floor, but they have with equal unanimity on three occasions recommended the Nicaragua route before the very same identical facts. There has not been any change in facts or figures except as to the $5,000,000 which the Commission say it will cost less, after we have paid $40,000,000 for the work on the canal, to build the Panama than the Nicaragua Canal. That is the whole question in the case, so far as they are concerned.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think it is.

Mr. MORGAN. If there is anything else, I have been unable to discover it.

Mr. SPOONER. In the first place, they point out the differences between the canals. Undoubtedly it would be impossible to compare two canals, one of which would not have some advantages over the other. But such a Commission I suppose would do just what the Senate would do or what any agent charged with such a duty would do. He would consider the advantages of each, and take the one which on the whole would best subserve the interest for which he was acting, whether it were an individual interest or the popular interest.

The minority report says—and it is sustained, so far as I am able to discover, in almost every particular by the report of the Commission—that the Panama Canal has an advantage in length over the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; the Commission have stated all those facts in the first, second, and third reports.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. The facts are just the same. The minority state that—

1. It is 134.57 miles shorter than the Nicaragua from sea to sea, being 49.09 miles by Panama, as against 183.66 miles by Nicaragua.

Is that disputed?

Mr. MORGAN. No; but then the Senator will certainly understand, I think, and the Senate will, too, that this Commission and all the French surveys had ascertained these facts. They have not been changed in any respect by the last report. The facts are just the same as they were in the former reports, except as to the $5,000,000.

Mr. SPOONER. I will get to that. Of course, I do not suppose that however many times the Commission went over it, the Nicaragua route would grow any shorter or the Panama route any longer.

Mr. MORGAN. It did grow longer.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps there was a more careful measurement.

Mr. MORGAN. No; they did not measure it at all. But still the Panama route grew longer.

Mr. SPOONER. The minority say:

2. It has less curvature, both in degrees and miles, being but 22.85 miles of curvature as against 49.29 on the Nicaragua; and but 771 degrees for Panama as against 2,339 degrees for Nicaragua.

I suppose that is true, and it is manifestly of great importance.

3. The actual time of transit is less, being but twelve hours of steaming by Panama as against a minimum of thirty-three hours of steaming by Nicaragua—that is, of one day of daylight as against three days of daylight.

I suppose that is true.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not admit what you are taking from the minority report.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not asking the Senator to admit anything. I say I suppose it is true.

Mr. MORGAN. I am prepared to controvert it.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no doubt the Senator is prepared to controvert anything in favor of the Panama route.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg pardon. I am only prepared to controvert it upon what the Isthmian Canal Commission have put upon record as the facts. I base my statements entirely upon what they themselves have said, and nothing else.

Mr. SPOONER. It continues:

For the canal must be navigated by day exclusively at first, and, to a great extent, always, especially by large ships, which chiefly will use it. The Commission's plan does not provide facilities for navigation by night.

4. The locks are fewer in number, being but 5 on Panama to 8 on the Nicaragua.

5. The harbors are better, those at the termini of the Panama being good and already used by the commerce of the world, while at the termini of the Nicaragua there are no harbors whatever.

They will have to be made and maintained.

6. The Panama route traverses a beaten track in civilization, having been in use by the commerce of the world for four centuries, while the Nicaragua route passes through an unsettled and undeveloped wilderness.

7. There already exists on the Panama route a railroad, perfect in every respect and equipped in a modern manner, closely following the line of the canal, and thus greatly facilitating the construction of the canal, as well as furnishing a source of revenue, and included in the offer of the Panama Company.

8. The annual cost of maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal would be $1,300,000 less than that of the Nicaragua.

That is the opinion of the Commission, and that, I suppose, is not for one year or ten years or forty years or fifty years, but probably for all time.

9. All engineering and practical questions involved in the construction of the Panama are satisfactorily settled and assured, all the physical conditions are known and the estimates of the cost reliable, while the Nicaragua involves unknown and uncertain factors in construction and unknown difficulties to be encountered which greatly increase the risks of construction and render uncertain the maximum cost of completion.

I suppose it is impossible, so far as the examinations have gone at Nicaragua, to make an accurate estimate of the cost. I have no doubt, from what is stated in this report, that it is not difficult to make an approximately accurate estimate of the cost of the Panama Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. To which report does the Senator from Wisconsin refer—the minority report or the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission?

Mr. SPOONER. The report of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

Mr. SPOONER. In their first report the Commissioners say:

The total amount—

For they were to ascertain for what the property could be acquired; for what concessions outstanding on either route could be bought, and that was all information necessary to be ascertained and reported to the President and Congress—

The total amount for which the company offers to sell and transfer its canal property to the United States is $109,141,500. This, added to the cost of completing the work, makes the whole cost of a canal by the Panama route $253,374,858, while the cost by the Nicaragua route is $189,864,062, a difference of $63,510,796 in favor of the Nicaragua route. In each case there must be added the cost of obtaining the use of the territory to be occupied and such other privileges as may be necessary for the construction and operation of the canal in perpetuity. The compensation that the different States will ask for granting these privileges is now unknown.

There are certain physical advantages, such as A SHORTER CANAL LINE, A MORE COMPLETE KNOWLEDGE OF THE COUNTRY THROUGH WHICH IT PASSES, AND LOWER COST OF MAINTENANCE AND OPERATION IN FAVOR OF THE PANAMA ROUTE, BUT THE PRICE FIXED BY THE PANAMA CANAL COMPANY FOR A SALE OF ITS PROPERTY AND FRANCHISES IS SO UNREASONABLE THAT ITS ACCEPTANCE CAN NOT BE RECOMMENDED BY THIS COMMISSION.

And upon that ground, as I understand their report, they reported in favor of the Nicaragua route.

After that, as is well known, came the offer from the New Panama Canal Company to sell its property to the United States for $40,000,000. This Commission was reconvened, and they again dealt with the subject with reference to that change, a fundamental change, keeping in mind the language of their first report, in the conditions or in the situation.

Mr. MORGAN. That was the only change, was it not?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; that was the only change.

Mr. MORGAN. Money.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; the Panama property was still the same property, and the Panama route was still the same route, and the Nicaragua route was still the same. The advantages of one over the other still remained the same. But, in view of the difference in price at which the Panama property could be obtained by the United States, they unanimously recommended the acquisition of the Panama property and the adoption of the Panama route as against the Nicaragua route.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will remember, I suppose, if he will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, that one of the commissioners, Mr. Haupt, under oath stated that he had reported in that way under protest?

Mr. SPOONER. All of the commissioners, as I recollect, except Mr. Haupt, testified that but for the question of price they would originally have recommended the Panama route. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know about Mr. Pasco.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Pasco is the lawyer. I am talking about the engineers. I am so old-fogyish myself that I have a notion that the business of the people ought to be done upon the same principles that govern sensible men in the transaction of their own business; and there is no board of directors or assemblage of gentlemen who, considering the embarkation of their private capital in an engineering project, would invest it without securing information and advice from competent engineers. They would not be likely to be influenced by the engineering opinions of lawyers or by the prejudices of laymen.

There is not a business man in the world who, considering a proposition to invest a dollar of his money in an enterprise which involves engineering skill as to location, as to works, as to cost, would entertain it for a moment without the advice of engineers in whose ability and integrity he had confidence. I know of no better way, I know of no loftier standard, by which a man in public life can transact the public business of this nation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it not probable, if not certain, that in making this last recommendation the Commission had in view not only the fact that the Panama Canal would cost $5,000,000 less to construct, but likewise the enormous difference in cost of maintenance between the two canals?

Mr. SPOONER. Of course. So far as Mr. Haupt is concerned—I am not acquainted with him—I have no doubt he is an intelligent and distinguished gentleman; I do not impeach at all his ability as an engineer, for I have no ground upon which to do it, but I am constrained to say this about Mr. Haupt: That, holding a public position on a Commission charged by the Congress of the United States, through appointment by the President, with reporting to the people after examination and the application of his knowledge and skill as an engineer that route which would best subserve the public interest for which he was acting, he showed some indefensible weakness when he signed a report in favor of the Panama route, being satisfied that the other is better. He said he did it in order to secure unanimity. All I have to say is that I would have thought better of his position if he had stood by his conviction, as I think he should have done, and dissented from the report. But let that go.

What the Senator from New Hampshire says, of course, is true. It is not to be imputed to the Commission, as I read their report, that they changed their recommendation solely because of a difference of $5,000,000 in cost of construction. It is not to be supposed for a moment that they forgot the difference in length; that they forgot the difference in the number of locks; that they forgot the difference in the time it will take to navigate the canals; that they forgot the difference in curvature and in the annual expense of maintenance and operation. They did not forget, I suppose, that a ship could go in the daytime through the Panama Canal and that it would take about three days for it to go in the daytime through the Nicaragua Canal, even with a tug. I suppose they remembered all the advantages—the harbor at either end—which they pointed out as peculiar to Panama as against the Nicaragua route, and they certainly did not forget that at the date of their supplemental report the cost of acquiring the property of the Panama Canal Company, including excavation, etc., had been reduced from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000.

They were disinterested gentlemen. All of them are distinguished in their profession. Admiral Walker is a man who has won by a great career enduring fame. They are not subject to impeachment, and it is not imputed to them that they have acted upon any other motive than a desire to discharge their duty honestly and intelligently and in the public interest; and nobody can impeach them. They point out the advantages of one route over the other; this reduction in price of the Panama Canal property; and they unanimously recommend the Panama route as the route which should be secured.

Congress is asked to set aside incontinently that report of distinguished experts and to act in opposition to it in a way; to substitute the judgment of lawyers and laymen; and those of us who are sent here, most of us without experience or skill in engineering, are asked to adopt the plan, not which the Commission recommends, but which we think is better.

I have not been able—although I want a canal, and I want it under this bill, and if we can not secure the Panama Canal I want the Nicaragua route—to cast aside the solemn report and judgment of these experts chosen by President McKinley, carrying on their work under an appropriation of a million dollars, taking abundance of time to do it, and making a report in such detail, and to substitute my own judgment for it. Other Senators may be willing to do that.

I am not able to disregard the report of the Commission and follow the "engineering" lead of the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]; and with all my respect for the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and there is no man whom I respect more, I can not follow him in opposition to the recommendation of the Commission. He wishes a canal, and so do I. He prefers Nicaragua; I favor, primarily, Panama. But, Mr. President, I must, in fairness and in justice, place here upon the permanent record of this body my conviction, and it is shared I have no doubt by the country, that the relation sustained by the Senator from Alabama to this subject is immeasurably above the question of route. Upon whatever route an isthmian canal shall be constructed, the Senator from Alabama will forever stand in the memory of the people as the father of the isthmian canal; for, in season and out of season, in sunshine and in storm, unappalled by obstacles and adverse influences, with lofty patriotism and unfaltering purpose, he has, with rare skill, tireless industry, and splendid advocacy, fought for an isthmian canal. When it comes, and it will come, his name will deservedly be identified with it far above that of any other man.

I am not prepared to say, discharging my duty to the people who sent me here, as to this great work, which is to cost so much, which means so much in time of peace and in time of war to this country, that I know as much as to which is the better route from an engineering standpoint as the Commission, nor am I able to say that I can follow any Senator here in his judgment upon that subject as against the judgment of the Commission.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? I wish to make my acknowledgments to the Senator for his beautiful compliment to me, but I wish to say to him that I have no judgment about this matter and set up none whatever. I am following the Commission in the three reports they made, either of which, I believe, is quite as much entitled to credit as the last one. I do not follow them upon the point that the saving of $5,000,000 is sufficient to overturn all those three reports and cast them aside. I merely follow them in their reports.

Mr. SPOONER. My judgment as a layman, although I would not act upon that alone, commends the conclusion of the Commission to me. One thing of infinite consequence, and you see it on that map, is the difference in the length of the canals. A canal 49 miles long as against one, 183 miles long. The shorter the canal, everyone can see, the better. A canal through which a steamship can go in the daytime, through which a sailing ship with a tug can go in the daytime, between sunrise and sunset, as against one that will require thirty-two hours! That is an incalculable advantage. It is an advantage in the matter of safety, and because it is an advantage in the matter of safety it is an advantage for all time, too, in the matter of insurance.

Panama is farther from some of our ports, measured by miles, but measured by time, so far as the steamship is considered, there is not an appreciable difference. Taking it as an original proposition, I think a man—lawyer or layman—being interrogated as to which canal would be preferable, one through which ships could pass between sunrise and sunset, or one through which it would take three days to pass in daylight, would not hesitate long to say that the former possessed a tremendous advantage.

There is another thing to me, speaking only as a layman, which has commended to me the Panama route since the report of the Commission as against the Nicaragua route, although I want the canal built on that if we can not build it on the other. That point is this: The Panama Canal, however it is built now, the testimony shows, can be made in the future a sea-level canal. The Nicaragua Canal can not. It is a mere matter of money. It is so stated in the report of the Commission. It is so stated in the testimony of the experts before the committee.

It may become of infinite importance to the people of the United States "in the long reach of time" to make a sea-level canal of it. Is it worth nothing to adopt the shorter canal? Is it worth nothing to have the certainty that in the future, if the public interest and safety demand it, with the expenditure of the requisite money, this can be made a sea-level canal? I think it is worth a great deal. Senators may think it is worth nothing.

Mr. MORGAN. That was the report of the Commission—that it was worth nothing and could not be done.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not the report of the Commission.

Mr. MORGAN. And they could not consider it.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not the report of the Commission.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, it is.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not the report of the Commission. The report rejected it——

Mr. MORGAN. I always so understood it.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not mean rudely to contradict the Senator from Alabama, but I will say that is not as I read it the report of the Commission. They rejected the sea-level plan for present purposes, but if the Senator will turn to page 88 he will find that the Commission say:

> If a sea-level canal be constructed, either the canal itself must be made of such dimensions that maximum floods, modified to some extent by a reservoir in the Upper Chagres, could pass down its channel without injury, or independent channels must be provided to carry off these floods. As the canal lies in the lowest part of the valley, the construction of such channels would be a matter of serious difficulty, and the simplest solution would be to make the canal prism large enough to take the full discharge itself.
> This would have the advantage, also, of furnishing a very large canal, in which navigation, under ordinary circumstances, would be exceptionally easy. It would involve a cross section from Obispo to the Atlantic, having an area of at least 15,000 square feet below the water line, which would give a bottom width of about 400 feet. The quantity of excavation required for such a canal has been roughly computed, and is found to be about 260,228,000 cubic yards. The cost of such a canal, including a dam at Alajuela and a tide lock at Miraflores, near the Pacific end, is estimated at not less than $240,000,000.
> Its construction would probably take at least twenty years. This Commission concurs with the various French commissions which have preceded it since the failure of the old company in rejecting the sea-level plan. While such a plan would be physically practicable, and might be adopted if no other solution were available, the difficulties of all kinds, and especially those of time and cost, would be so great that a canal with a summit level reached by locks is to be preferred.

But given the practicability of it, Mr. President, in the long years to come, when our population has grown to 300,000,000, and our wealth in proportion, and the commerce of the world, immeasurably increased, is using this canal, as it will do, who shall say that the people of the United States would care whether it cost $200,000,000 or $500,000,000 to turn this canal into a sea-level canal? All I mean to say is this, and to me it is entitled to great significance and influence in favor of the Panama Canal, with its other advantages, that as to it in the time to come, if our people want to make of it a sea-level canal, they can do so, when as to the other, no matter how much they want it, they can not do so.

There is another thing, Mr. President, which has influenced me somewhat since I first began to read about the Panama Canal within the last two or three years. I think General Abbot's article was the first that led me to study the subject at all. I refer to the fact that it is two-fifths completed, that it is a short canal, and that there is a good harbor at either end of it.

I do not know that it is wise to say what I intend to in the open Senate, and I would not be governed by it if the Nicaragua route were clearly preferable; but if we build the Nicaragua Canal, making of it, as we have by our treaty with England made it, in a sense, a provincial canal (in other words, we are the sole guarantor of its neutrality, with a right to close it against an enemy), with this short, feasible, partly constructed canal, with the work of excavation easily available at any time, in the ever increasing struggle between the commercial nations of the earth for trade, in the jealousies which have always existed and which always will exist between nations, I have feared that the time would come when, not with private money, but through governmental money placed perhaps in corporate hands, this canal would be finished. It is lying there two-fifths done, feasible, short.

It is a continuous invitation, Mr. President, to any hostile influence or power which should desire its construction. It lies there a constant menace to the interests and to the safety in the future of the United States. I have thought it might be completed, and that the day might come when our Oregon would go around the Horn again, and an enemy's Oregon might go through this short canal. It will be said that if we build the Panama Canal some other government will probably build the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. I see nothing to prevent it.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, its much greater length than the Panama Canal will tend to prevent it. As it is, with our short canal completed and a competitor, with the unknown factors of cost in it, I hardly think that it would be an inviting project to any other government.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, there is not an unknown factor in it, because there have been five surveys made, or different estimates by five great engineer corps, and they have all pronounced in favor of each of five different routes.

Mr. SPOONER. There were several Nicaragua route reports, and I think they all differed very much in their estimates.

Mr. MORGAN. They did, because they commenced with a canal 18 feet deep and went down to one of 36.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course all the disadvantages which the Commission indicate in Nicaragua would be obvious to any interest which thought of its construction. Certainly no private interest would ever construct the Nicaragua Canal, because the United States, the richest nation in the world, owning and operating the short canal, would be a competitor and able to open the canal to all the world at rates which would drive into bankruptcy in a moment any private interest that should seek to utilize the Nicaragua route as a competitor.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, except for the fact, which, as he knows, would be true, that sailing ships can not go through the Panama Canal. Sailing ships can go through the Nicaragua Canal, and sailing ships constitute to-day more than half of the tonnage of the American mercantile marine.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course the Senator says that, and he believes it.

Mr. MORGAN. The facts are here to show it.

Mr. SPOONER. I think sailing ships can go through the Panama Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. They can not get away from there after they go through.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the same tug which takes them through in twelve hours, if it spends the same amount of time required to tug sailing ships through the Nicaragua Canal, will get a sailing ship out of the Panama Canal and through the doldrums.

Mr. MORGAN. They would have to be tugged from three to five hundred miles.

Mr. SPOONER. There is a difference of opinion about that.

Mr. MORGAN. I know there is a difference.

Mr. SPOONER. From three to five hundred miles is a pretty large margin. You can get them out 300 miles anyway during the time it would take to go through the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. Some of them have been tugged 700 miles.

Mr. SPOONER. A boat would not have to be tugged 700 miles to get out beyond the doldrums at Panama, as I understand it. The Senator said from 300 miles to 500 miles.

Mr. MORGAN. They have been tugged 700 miles, the witnesses state. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. SPOONER. As the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] says, we can not get any guarantee from any country about the weather, whether there will be wind or calm. We take our chances on that.

Now, Mr. President, that brings me to the substitute which I have offered, and I will answer the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. He used a word which I think must have been inadvertent. He said that it had been charged that the purpose of this substitute was to defeat the construction of a canal.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I did not charge it, but——

Mr. SPOONER. I did not say the Senator charged it. I have heard it said that that would be its effect.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understood the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to distinctly charge the other day in his speech that that was the purpose, and the charge has been made again and again that that was the purpose of this movement. I have heard it a number of times.

Mr. MORGAN. I have never made it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not know who made it, but I have heard it made.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to have the RECORD show who has made such charges.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] made it in the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. There is one. Now give others.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I will not read the substitute. I shall offer some amendments to it, which I have shown to the Senator from Alabama, only one of which, perhaps, would be regarded as other than verbal, and that we can discuss later. As I said in the beginning, the whole theory of this substitute, as I devised it and drew it, and I acknowledge that it is imperfect, was to put before the Senate a bill based upon a broad view of the reports of the Commission.

First. That the Panama Canal is a feasible, practicable canal.

Second. That the Nicaragua Canal is a feasible and practicable canal.

Third. That the Panama Canal is the better canal for the United States to choose for the reasons which I have hastily given, and for others.

Therefore I drew this substitute, so that if a majority of Congress thought it wise to follow the Commission they would enact it or something similar to it, and if we are able to obtain title for $40,000,000 to the Panama property, and a concession satisfactory to the American people from the Colombian Government, it will be the duty of the President of the United States to proceed with the construction of the Panama Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. The substitute was drawn before the Colombia proposition came in?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, the proposed treaty. But second, with the alternative, that if the President shall be unable to secure a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company, and of course also a satisfactory concession from Colombia, then having secured satisfactory concessions from Costa Rica and Nicaragua, it shall be his duty to proceed, using almost the language of the Hepburn bill, and cause to be constructed the Nicaragua Canal.

That is all there is of it, Mr. President. If that were enacted, the President, of course, would endeavor to obtain a satisfactory title to the Panama Canal property. The Senator says it can not be done.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon if he has not said that.

Mr. MORGAN. I have said this, that so far as the action of the French courts were concerned it can not be done under that act so as to cut off the right of lien and equity of bondholders and stockholders against the property, and Mr. Pasco, when he was testifying before the Senate committee, agrees with it.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not agree with it.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good. I want to state my own position about it. I do not doubt that Colombia has the power to make a full, complete, and perfect title to this property, notwithstanding its concessions to the Panama Canal Company, but I say it is the duty of the United States to deal with that Government in getting rid of these concessions and to have a guaranty from the Government of Colombia that we shall be safe when we get through with the job.

Mr. SPOONER. If it shall be found that the Senator's opinion is sustained, and we can not for the $40,000,000 obtain a satisfactory title——

Mr. MORGAN. I would not deal for one minute with the Panama Canal Company—not for a moment.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, if I want a piece of property and I think somebody can give me a good title to it and we can agree upon the price I will deal with him.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has his choice. He pays his money and of course he can have his choice.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly, I would have to pay my money, but I would be very careful not to pay my money unless I got a good title to the property.

Now, of course, no title could be a satisfactory title within the provision of this substitute which came encumbered with all or any of the claims and liens of the old Panama Canal Company. When the Senator says that any title which can be obtained from the New Panama Canal Company must come burdened with the claims of the old receivership——

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, in the present condition, yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, he says, that title can not be obtained under this proposed substitute.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not believe it can, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, that means the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, and this is not left open in any large degree in the matter of time. If these people can not make a title which the law officers of the Government and the skillful men whom the President could call to his assistance pronounce to be an absolute title, within a reasonable time he is to proceed to the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal, having first obtained, of course, concessions from Costa Rica and Nicaragua.

Mr. MORGAN. I am almost, if the Senator will pardon me, tempted to ask him the question, whether he does not believe that if his substitute is adopted it will result in building the canal at Nicaragua?

Mr. SPOONER. It may.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the Senator's opinion about that?

Mr. SPOONER. I hope we will get title to the Panama property and the necessary concession from Colombia and will build the Panama Canal, because, Mr. President, for reasons which I have given, I think that is the safer and better canal for the United States to build. I am "banking," if I may use that word, on the experts and on the recommendation of the Commission.

I could not persuade myself, Mr. President, in the face of that report, to vote for the Nicaraguan Canal and against the Panama, and get one hundred and fifty or two hundred or three hundred million dollars invested in the Nicaragua and have it prove to have been disadvantageous some day. I would hate to have my people turn to me and say, "Well, you put your judgment as to the safer and better canal for the United States against a great body of experts chosen by President McKinley and sent over the ground with abundance of money to investigate with care and skill and report the better route." I am not willing to take that responsibility.

One thing the Senator can be certain of. Every doubt as to that title would be resolved by the President of the United States or any other public officer against the vendor.

Mr. MORGAN. We will get the Nicaragua Canal, if that is to be the case.

Mr. SPOONER. I can not help that. Then the Senator ought to be content. The President never lived who would, being responsible for the abstract of title, pay $40,000,000 of the people's money for a property on which was to be expended hundreds of millions more unless absolutely certain that his Government received a perfect title.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose it is my duty to judge on the facts whether the title is good or not, instead of referring that question to the President.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think the Senate of the United States is a body that can deal well with an abstract of title. I rather think——

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I do not know that the President has any special reputation for dealing with abstracts of title.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, I am surprised at the Senator from Alabama. Does he understand from this that the President himself is to do this thing?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, of course, I do understand that the President of the United States is responsible for it.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah! he is responsible for it; that is true.

Mr. MORGAN. If his conscience is not satisfied and his judgment is not satisfied in adopting the opinions of others, and if he is not guided by an enlightened, scientific, legal investigation of the truth of the situation, I should be afraid to mention the consequences.

Mr. SPOONER. The President or any other public official would be afraid to take a title that he was not certain was good. I have thought it of the utmost folly (I do not hesitate to assert it, and especially in view of this debate here) for Congress to undertake to investigate and decide this question of title, and, although perhaps it is an unwelcome duty to put upon the President, it is really, in a case like this, an executive function.

Mr. MORGAN. Hardly.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it is. The President has an able and experienced Attorney-General. He will have the power under this bill to bring to his aid in France and in this country the highest professional skill which can be found; and the Senator, I think, need not have any doubt that the lawyers who certify, if any shall be found to do it, this title to the President of the United States will be absolutely safe and certain about it. No better safeguard, so far as the title is concerned, was ever put in a law than this will prove to be.

The Senator from Alabama criticised this substitute because it does not contain an inventory of the property which we are to buy. I recollect the Senator, and I voted for it, secured the passage of a bill here once—I think I am not mistaken—under the terms of which some property was to be bought of the Maritime Canal Company. There was not a schedule of it in the bill. I did not think of criticising the bill for that reason.

Mr. MORGAN. My criticism on the bill in that particular is that there is no provision in it for having an inventory made. We take it in the lump.

Mr. SPOONER. The Commission has reported one of the most complete inventories that was ever made of property.

Mr. MORGAN. I can not accept that, because I am satisfied that it is entirely incorrect in some particulars. It is not necessary to discuss it; we did not consider it at all necessary to ascertain that. But if your substitute is carried, there ought to be a provision in it by which an inventory would be submitted by the Panama Canal Company definitely as to what it proposes to sell.

Mr. SPOONER. They have submitted an inventory and the Commission has reported at great length an inventory. I met Admiral Walker a day or two ago and asked him about it. He says they have in their possession from the French company as complete, detailed, and perfect an inventory as ever was made by a company.

Mr. MORGAN. Have we got it here

Mr. SPOONER. Where?

Mr. MORGAN. Here in Congress?

Mr. SPOONER. No. Would you want me to put it in this bill?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not want you to put anything in it, but if you want to make a good bill of it you ought to put it in.

Mr. SPOONER. Then you would have to put in so many mule carts, so many mules, and so many wheelbarrows, etc., ad infinitum. It is all idle to criticise this proposition because it does not contain an inventory of the vast property which is to be purchased or to be passed by this purchase, if we make one.

Mr. MORGAN. I am afraid of a lump-sum purchase, paying $40,000,000, no more, no less, for the property without an account of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course the sum is lump, but the property is not lump; that is to say, there will be a detailed statement of the property we buy. I think the President and the officers who are to carry this out, especially the Commission who have gone all over this property, both in Paris and on the Isthmus of Panama, having the original invoices or inventories of the property brought from France and which they read in France, will be able to discover whether any property is omitted from it or not. But really, Mr. President, that is not a matter of much consequence here. It is a matter of detail and administration.

Now, Senators have stood here by the hour saying that we can not get any title to this property; Senators, of course, who are in favor of the Nicaraguan route. They assert that with the utmost positiveness. It was asserted by my distinguished friend from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], it was asserted by my distinguished friend from Washington [Mr. TURNER], I think it was asserted by my distinguished friend from California [Mr. PERKINS], that we can not get any title to this property. If that is true, then it means the Nicaragua Canal and without any great delay.

Mr. PERKINS. If my friend will permit me, Mr. President, I did not say that we could get no title from Colombia; but I did say that in the memorandum or proctocol it is provided that the president of The Hague Peace Treaty Conference shall virtually fix the rate of toll that this Government shall pay to the Republic of Colombia, and that that practically meant the confiscation of every dollar this Government placed in the canal.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to make a further suggestion?

Mr. SPOONER. What the Senator from California observed has nothing whatever to do with what I asked him. Is the Senator from Oregon about to make a similar observation?

Mr. MITCHELL. I was about to add a suggestion to the statement of the distinguished Senator from California to this effect, that the time fixed for the determination of this question by the chief minister of The Hague is a time beyond the period when it is supposed the canal will be completed—fourteen years.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have not dealt at all, nor do I intend to deal at all, except in a single word, with the tentative treaty which is proposed here by Colombia. It is not satisfactory to me, nor is the Nicaragua treaty quite satisfactory to me. Whichever of these bills is passed, the Hepburn bill or the substitute, I do not suppose that terms which are to bind the Government forever will be entered upon which are not notified fully to the Senate, with opportunity to debate and to amend.

I would not be willing to put a dollar of Government money myself into the construction of a canal unless the term during which our right to control and maintain it is clearly perpetual and the rental adjusted. I would not want it left to be recast by arbitration. Therefore, I have given no attention, so far as the practical question before us is concerned, to that particular phase of this subject any more than to an objection I have, more or less serious, to the proposed treaty with Nicaragua. Before we invest our money in a canal by either route the concession will have to be satisfactory to this country.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me one single question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator construe the language of his amendment to mean that no money can be expended by the Government of the United States until a treaty satisfactory to the President has been negotiated with the Colombian Government and that treaty has been ratified by the Senate?

Mr. SPOONER. I do. I do not understand that a treaty can become the law of the land or become anything more than a mere proposition under the Constitution of the United States until it has been submitted to the Senate and ratified by the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Senator leaves that branch of the subject will he answer me a question?

Mr. SPOONER. I will if I can.

Mr. MITCHELL. There are outstanding now, according to the testimony, something over thirteen hundred millions of securities at their par value, in France, including bonds and stocks, and the money that was raised on those securities created the property which it is now proposed to sell to us by the New Panama Canal Company, or most of it. Now, what I want to know is whether the Senator from Wisconsin has considered this question: Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that good and satisfactory title to the property can be obtained, has the Senator considered the possibility, if not, indeed, the probability, of those people who furnished this money assuming the position that we having become the beneficiaries of this property that their money created, coming here before the Congress of the United States by platoons and regiments for years and years to come, and claiming an equitable right against this Government?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know. I have not considered very elaborately who will come here to Congress.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is a very important point to consider in relation to this question.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think it is. I do not think it is important what people claim from Congress, but I have considered this question, whether they would have any claim whatever upon this property either morally, equitably, or legally, which, under this bill, will have passed to the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. The old French spoliation claims arising under our treaty with France we had here for a long time.

Mr. SPOONER. We assumed those by treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; we assumed them, but they are here yet.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator ought to be able to—I will not say that, for he is able—but he has forgotten, certainly, that we assumed the payment of those claims in the treaty with France. Does not the Senator see the distinction between that case and this?

Mr. MITCHELL. I admit that it is a stronger case in favor of the old French spoliation claims; but yet what I want to suggest is the probability, which I think exists, that if we buy this property we will be pestered for years and years to come by these people in France who furnished the money with which to construct this canal.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator might, with just as much propriety, forbear to purchase at a foreclosure sale, in a time of great financial depression, a splendid property for one-fiftieth of what it cost, lest in after years the mortgagor should come to him claiming that he ought to give him something because he had acquired the beneficial interest in a property which the mortgagor had created with his money.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is an entirely different proposition. We are not dealing with an individual here, but we are dealing with a great Government, 800,000 of whose people furnished the money to create this property which it is proposed this Government shall buy.

Mr. SPOONER. We are not dealing with 800,000 people in France, nor 300,000 people, nor 200,000 people, nor 50 people.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think we are.

Mr. SPOONER. The old Panama Canal Company, of course, went down in disastrous financial failure.

Mr. MORGAN. It did not die, however. It is living yet, and has got a liquidator.

Mr. SPOONER. The old Panama Canal Company went down in disastrous financial failure, not only overwhelmed with indebtedness of all sorts, which it could not pay, but having, of course, a large body of stockholders who had lost money in it—the money which they had invested in the stock. It became and was a bankrupt corporation, and the court of France having appropriate jurisdiction took control of its assets under the laws of France, sequestrated them by the appointment of a receiver—because the legal effect there is as it is here—and pronounced a decree dissolving the corporation, a decree which stands as the law of France to-day as to that company, not only unreversed, but impossible to be reversed.

Therefore the assets passed into the hands of the liquidator or receiver by the decree of a court having jurisdiction not only of the subject-matter, but of the parties, for it is a French corporation, and the assets of that company are to be disposed of, not by the 800,000 creditors and stockholders, or any of them, but by the court, just as we dispose of similar matters in the United States, and just as they are disposed of everywhere where justice is administered according to the forms of law.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I inquire of the Senator what guaranty have we, if any—I do not know that it is necessary—but what guaranty have we, if any, that in case we buy this property this 60 per cent, which the liquidator of the old company is entitled to receive, will be paid over to those stockholders and creditors?

Mr. SPOONER. I will get to that. The Senator seems to be more concerned about the 800,000 French people than he is about his own people here or as to whether this is the route that ought to be adopted.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to protect my own people against these claims if possible.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but not more than I do. Then the Parliament of France found it necessary to pass an act for the administration of this estate, and they passed an act which, in its legal effect, is very much like our chancery practice and our use of injunctions and restraining orders, in order to enable the court having jurisdiction to wind up the proceedings, to marshal the assets, to preserve the property, and to require all creditors to bring their claims and prosecute their suits in that court. They passed an act signed by Carnot, "done at Marly-le-Roi on the 1st of July, 1893." I will not stop to read it, but I will ask leave to put it in my remarks.

The act referred to is as follows:

AN ACT RELATIVE TO THE LIQUIDATION OF THE UNIVERSAL COMPANY OF THE PANAMA INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

The senate and the chamber of deputies have adopted and enacted, and the President of the Republic promulgates, the following law:

ARTICLE 1. From the date of the promulgation of the present law, all actions now in course of procedure that have been brought by holders of bonds or obligations emitted by the Universal Company of the Panama Interoceanic Canal, or that have been brought by any creditors of the said company, whether against the receiver in his official capacity, or against the directors to enforce their responsibility, or against third parties for restitution, or arising in any other manner whatsoever, are hereby declared discontinued and suspended. The plaintiff may follow up and prosecute said actions only by complying with the requirements of articles 2 and 3 hereof.

All proceedings concerning attachments and execution, even those now in course of enforcement and procedure, against the personal or real estate or property of the said company are likewise discontinued and suspended.

I. BOND OR OBLIGATION HOLDERS' ATTORNEY.

ART. 2. All rights of action, of any character whatever, accruing to owners of obligations emitted by the Universal Company of the Panama Interoceanic Canal, whether against the receiver in his official capacity or against the directors to enforce their responsibility, or for a right to restitution arising from any other cause, shall be enforced and sued on by an attorney or representative appointed for the purpose, on request of the commonwealth's attorney for the jurisdiction of the civil tribunal of the Seine, by a decree in chambers.

In case there should arise a divergence or opposition of interests between the different classes of bondholders one or more special attorneys may be appointed in the manner and form just above provided for. The powers of the attorneys aforesaid may be revoked at the same request and in the same manner. There shall be no appeal from said orders or decrees.

However, any obligation holder shall have the right to enter an action for damages in connection with a criminal matter, or to intervene in proceedings instituted by the attorney or representative aforesaid, doing so at his own expense and cost, without in any way delaying the proceedings or judgment.

Moreover, every obligation holder shall have the power to bring any action, in his individual right and at his own risk and peril, which the attorney shall have refused or failed to enter within one month after he shall have been notified and requested to enter the same.

Suits brought by the attorneys or representatives shall not block the right of action on the part of the company, belonging to the receiver. The attorneys shall have power to call on the receiver for communication of all documents tending to shed light on the truth; their legal residence shall be the jurisdiction within which shall be carried on the winding up or liquidation of the company's affairs; the tax costs arising from the exercise of their official duties shall be defrayed from the credits of the receivership, so far as this may be done without impairing the reimbursement to the latter of the sums which it shall have advanced.

ART. 3. All actions emanating from the receiver or from the attorneys, or from interested parties individually, shall be brought before the civil tribunal of the Seine. Such proceedings as may arise from the distribution of the credits or balance remaining in favor of the company shall be brought likewise before this tribunal. Suits instituted by parties intervening in damages shall remain in the jurisdiction where already the prosecution has been inaugurated.

ART. 4. The attorney shall have full and complete enjoyment of the "judicial assistance privilege" (consisting in the exemption from payment of the usual costs attending a judicial proceeding) in the carrying on of actions and in the executing of verdicts or decisions which he shall have obtained. Likewise he shall enjoy the same in all interventions sounding in damages, and in the case of all recording taxes which might be otherwise exacted. On his request, presented to the commonwealth's attorney, pleaders, advocates, and sheriffs shall be appointed in the manner and form prescribed by article 13 of the law dated January 22, 1851.

However, the "judicial assistance privilege" shall not extend to costs of transportation for judges, for Government officials, or for experts, nor to the latter's fees, nor to witness taxes. As to stamp duties, cost of recording, and court costs in general, the Treasury shall exact them from the debtor only after the payment of such judgment as shall have been obtained by the plaintiff attorney.

ART. 5. The attorney shall have power to compromise or to desist from further action, though he may do so only after consulting with three jurists appointed by the Commonwealth's attorney; and all compromises or withdrawals of actions shall have to be ratified and approved by judicial decree rendered in chambers.

He alone shall be empowered to levy execution on judgments pronounced by the court, or to receive the sums obtained on compromise, whether such compromise have been obtained on his own demand or on that of obligation holders acting in an individual capacity. All sums thus received shall be deposited by him at the deposit bureau, and the receiver shall give him due quittance therefor.

II. THE RECEIVER.

ART. 6. Before proceeding at all to distribute the credits of the company the receiver shall publish in the Journal Officiel and in the Journal Officiel (Commune edition) a notice calling on all parties interested to produce their claims against the company and the proofs thereof within the space of six months, under pain of becoming barred from bringing any action on the said claims.

The production of the claims and the transmission of proofs in support thereof may be made by simple registered letter.

ART. 7. The receiver shall proceed to verify and to admit said claims in the manner and form prescribed by articles 495 and 497, first paragraph of the Code of Commerce.

ART. 8. Should the claim be contested, notice of this fact shall be sent by registered mail to the claimant in question, and the latter shall have a term of three months within which he must institute proceedings before the civil tribunal of the Seine, in order to have his claim adjudicated.

Judgment must be pronounced hereon within the space of one month, as in the case of matter demanding immediate and summary adjudication. An appeal from such decision must be entered within ten days from the notification of said judgment either to the party in person or at his domicile.

ART. 9. The distribution of all dividends arising from an action brought by the company or from actions brought by the attorney or representative of obligation holders, or from any other source whatever, shall be made by the receiver, who alone shall have competency to receive opposition or objections to the same.

ART. 10. All acts tending to alienate any assets of the company, all contracts entailing a transfer or contribution of the whole or of a part of the assets of the concern, emanating from the receiver of the Universal Company of the Panama Interoceanic Canal, shall be subject to the approval or ratification of the civil tribunal of the Seine, who shall, on the report of one of the justices, pass on the question in open court.

ART. 11. All decrees of approval or ratification rendered in accordance with the preceding article shall be published, within a term of ten days, in the Journal Officiel and in the Journal Officiel (Commune edition).

This decree may be attacked by a third party, by the shareholders, by the attorney of obligation holders, and by other creditor of the company, within a delay not exceeding one month from the date of the publication aforesaid. The civil tribunal shall adjudicate the question within the space of one month, as in the case of matters demanding an immediate and summary adjudication. The appeal from such decision must be entered within ten days from the time of notification of said judgment to the party in person or at his domicile.

ART. 12. The Universal Company of the Panama Interoceanic Canal, the civil, i. e., nontrading company formed for the purpose of redeeming the obligations or bonds of the Panama Canal (issue of March, 1888), and the civil or nontrading company for the redemption of the lottery bonds of the Panama Canal are hereby exempted from the payment of all stamp duties and of all transfer or transmission taxes now due or about to become due on any shares, obligations, or bonds of the said companies.

ART. 13. Beginning with the date of the promulgation of the present law, no limitation in bar of actions in damages shall begin to run against the creditors of the Panama Canal Universal Company until the balance remaining to the credit of the company shall have been realized on and entirely distributed.

ART. 14. Shareholders, subscribers, or buyers of stock, having acquired title to the same before the company was placed into the hands of a receiver, provided they represent at least one-twentieth of the capital stock, may join a common interest and intrust one or more attorneys or representatives with maintaining any action and with representing them in court.

The present law, deliberated upon and adopted by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies, shall be enforced as a law of the State.

Done at Marly-le-Roi, on the 1st day of July, 1893.

CARNOT.

By the President of the Republic:

E. GUERIN,
The Keeper of the Seals, the Minister of Justice.
P. PEYTRAL,
The Minister of Finance.

Mr. SPOONER. They provided for short appeals. They provided for bringing everybody before the court. They provided counsel for all who had not the money to employ counsel—counsel representing the public for the benefit of the bondholders, stockholders, and common creditors. There never was a more generous proceeding in court, because this was a great national affliction and calamity. They provided for individual interventions. They made every possible provision for giving notice and giving hearings. The act is admirable in its construction, and I have no doubt it worked out admirably in administration.

They contemplated, Mr. President, as all this estate had passed from the company and was in custodia legis under control of an equity tribunal having the power to deal with it upon general principles of equity that it would be disposed of free and clear of lien, leaving the purchase money a substituted asset to which claims of every kind were remitted, the court having jurisdiction to marshal the assets and adjust priorities, just as we do in this country.

Of course, they contemplated that a new company might be organized—not a reorganization of the old company, as we reorganize old railway companies and other corporations which are insolvent—but this property, as much as it had cost, was worth nothing unless it was at once sold out for a trifle, or unless some attempt was made through a new corporation to go on with the work. Most of the property was on the Isthmus of Panama. It was held under a concession, which, if not complied with, forfeited it all to the Government of Colombia, and so the law provided as to the receivership:

ART. 10. All acts tending to alienate any assets of the company, all contracts entailing a transfer or contribution of the whole or of a part of the assets of the concern emanating from the receiver of the Universal Company of the Panama Interoceanic Canal, shall be subject to the approval or ratification of the civil tribunal of the Seine, who shall, on the report of one of the justices, pass on the question in open court.

Then they provided the details, but without going into that——

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. How did that court get jurisdict on

Mr. SPOONER. The court took jurisdiction. The act gave jurisdiction.

Mr. MORGAN. They took jurisdiction. That is right.

Mr. PETTUS. I mean how did the court get jurisdiction over the property?

Mr. SPOONER. The court got jurisdiction over the res, over the property owned by the company.

Mr. PETTUS. But I ask how did they obtain it?

Mr. SPOONER. They obtained it by having jurisdiction of the corporation in insolvency.

Mr. PETTUS. Is that all the information the Senator can give me as to the process by which the court obtained jurisdiction?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir. I have never seen a copy of the original proceedings. Whether ancillary proceedings were instituted in Panama I have not been able to ascertain, nor did I consider it important to ascertain it.

Mr. President, they organized a corporation. The liquidator transferred to the corporation these assets. Part of the contract was that the New Panama Canal Company should go forward with the work of completing the canal, and that as the liquidator of the old Panama Canal Company was to receive, they also transferred the stock of the old Panama Canal Company to the new, which was an asset of liquidation to the New Panama Canal Company. They were to proceed with the construction of the canal and they were to pay to the liquidator, to the receiver, for distribution by the court, 60 per cent of the net profits of this operating the canal.

The articles contemplated that they might find it impossible to go on with the canal, they might find it impossible to raise the money to proceed with its construction—and the articles were affirmed by the court—and provided that if the company concluded for any reason not to proceed with the completion of the canal they should retain the Panama Railway Company stock by paying to the liquidator 20,000,000 francs, and in default of the payment the property should revert to the liquidator.

Mr. MORGAN. That relates to the Panama Railroad Company.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; and it was the Panama Railway Company's stock that they were to retain if they paid 20,000,000 francs for it.

Then what happened? The New Panama Canal Company, which had no relation except that of a contract relation—not with the old company at all—but a contract relation approved by the court with the liquidator of the old company went on and they paid 2,000,000 francs, I believe, for an extension of the concession. Without that, the old Panama Canal Company and its receivership would have owned nothing on the Isthmus of Panama. The new company expended $12,000,000 in engineering and other work on the Isthmus of Panama.

The court approved the transfer by the receiver to the New Panama Canal Company.

This conveyance by the liquidator of the old company to the new company of all the property of the old company was authorized expressly by the court and by the act of Parliament. Appeals were taken by intervenors, and the court on appeal justified entirely the legality and wisdom of the transaction, and says this of the effect of the act of July 1, 1893, which I have inserted:

That this act, in principle, authorized the receiver to make, under conditions which it fixed, all the efforts and all conversions of assets; and that it did not intend that creditors should be able to prevent these acts, and that it was for the express purpose of preventing them from doing so that it suspended their suits and executions.

From this there was no appeal.

The charter also authorized the company explicitly to reduce its capital and to dissolve its existence, and it expressly excluded that those interested in the estate of the old company by virtue of the 60 per cent provision should have any control whatever over the new company.

What followed? They could not raise the money. The United States Government appeared in the field to build a canal of its own with its own money, and that meant ruin, of course, to the New Panama Canal Company as a mere private company. There is nothing in the record as to that, but that is obvious to anyone, especially with all the mishaps which had befallen the credit of the old company.

Thereupon this offer—to make it as short as I can—to sell this property to the United States for $40,000,000 was made by the authority of the stockholders of the New Panama Canal Company. In fact, it meant $40,000,000 or nothing; and Senators who entertain such boundless sympathy for the stockholders and bondholders in France forget that this $40,000,000, if paid, goes largely to them as the court of equity shall decree their interest to be; and if it be not accepted, they receive nothing, except the 20,000,000 francs which the new company is to pay for the capital stock of the railway company if it retains it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. This first arrangement between the liquidator of the old company and the New Panama Canal Company was made eight years ago, or about 1894.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator from Wisconsin understand that the title of the property was transferred at that time to the New Panama Canal Company by the old company?

Mr. SPOONER. Absolutely, through that court.

Mr. MITCHELL. Through the liquidator?

Mr. SPOONER. Through the liquidator, by order of the court.

Mr. MITCHELL. So that the title vested, then, in the New Panama Canal Company?

Mr. SPOONER. Subject to this contract.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let me ask the Senator another question. This New Panama Canal Company is a solvent company, is it not?

Mr. SPOONER. So far as I know; yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. And has always been a solvent company?

Mr. SPOONER. So far as I know.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I want to know of the Senator from Wisconsin how a French court gets jurisdiction over a solvent corporation which enables it to make an order that will stand anywhere, under any system of jurisprudence, authorizing a solvent corporation to transfer its property?

Mr. SPOONER. There is no receiver of the New Panama Canal Company. That company is not in the French courts, so far as I know; but the liquidator of the old canal company still lives, and is still an officer of the court. When this contract was made with the New Panama Canal Company, by which, under authority of an act of the French Parliament, it became the owner of the property of the old Panama Canal Company by conveyance from the receiver or liquidator by authority of the court, I say that, as a matter of law, the property passed to the new company, subject to this contract to pay 60 per cent of the net profits and free otherwise from all claims and liens of creditors and stockholders of the old company, and subject to a reverter as to the railway property; but so far as the old company's estate is concerned, it is still in the hands of the court, and all stockholders and creditors are in that case in that court.

When this new situation came, when this concession, which expires, I think, in 1910, and which had to be taken care of, when the United States came into the field as the intended constructor and owner of an interoceanic canal, it occurred to those very sensible people that they had better get under cover if they could. They proposed to sell to the United States at $40,000,000. Thereupon the liquidator of the old company applied to the court which appointed him, and which has jurisdiction of him and of the estate of which he is liquidator, including this contract of 60 per cent of the net earnings, for leave to modify that contract and to join in a sale of this property to the United States——

Mr. MITCHELL. I admit the correctness of what the Senator states, that they can modify that contract, but I deny that that French court or any other court has power to issue an order authorizing and directing a private corporation which is absolutely solvent to transfer its property.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is denying something that never happened.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, no.

Mr. SPOONER. That is precisely what the court did not do.

Mr. MITCHELL. You are here to-day, as I understand, proposing to buy this property under the authority of an order made by a French court in a matter pending before that court—the property of the old Panama Canal Company.

Mr. SPOONER. I am here to-day, just as the Senator is, trying to do what is right for the American people. He is trying to do what is right, and I am trying to do what is right. Here is where the Senator makes his mistake: The court has made no order directing the New Panama Canal Company to sell or convey its property to the United States for $40,000,000.

The New Panama Canal Company make that proposition by authority of the stockholders, and all that the court has done is to authorize the liquidator, who represents the interest of the creditors and stockholders of the old Panama Canal Company in this contract of transfer to the new company, to join in this sale and to save that much for the old Panama Canal Company's creditors and stockholders. It proceeded thus far, as I understand it.

There were applications made to the court, and the court passed an order, after it had been referred to the attorney-general or some public attorney there, authorizing the liquidator to join in the sale and to enter into arbitration with the New Panama Canal Company as to what proportion of this $40,000,000 should be paid to the liquidator for the benefit of the creditors and stockholders of the old company. They are all there, and they have got to fight their claims there, and that is a court of France administering a lawsuit in France, to which citizens of France are parties. That arbitration agreed upon this:

They agreed that the New Panama Canal Company shall retain 2,000,000 francs, I think it was, which had been paid for the concession and not long ago for an extension of it; they agreed that the 20,000,000 francs for the Panama Railway stock, which the New Panama Canal Company retained and included in its offer to sell, should be paid to the liquidator, and they agreed that $12,000,000, which the New Panama Canal Company had actually expended at a low rate of interest, should go back to them, and that twenty-four millions and a fraction of the money and the twenty millions realized from the Panama Railway stock should go to the liquidator. That is the way it stands.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I can not altogether agree with that. There is another question right there.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator does not mean to say that that was an order to the New Panama Canal Company to sell this property? It does not amount to that.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Wisconsin admits that 60 per cent of this property should go to the liquidator for the benefit of the stockholders of the old company?

Mr. SPOONER. It was to go to the liquidator.

Mr. MITCHELL. Sixty per cent of the $40,000,000 was to go to the liquidator. That matter is pending in the court, and that court is not a court of last resort. When this report of sale is made and this fund is paid into court, as it has to be, I presume, then comes up the question as to what shall be done with it and what order the court shall make. I take it that any person interested either as a shareholder or a security holder in the old company would have a right to go in and make the question in that court. Is that right?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the claim is decided adversely, the claimant has the right to appeal to a higher court in Paris?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, what I want to know of the Senator from Wisconsin is, does he think it is a very safe or advisable proceeding for us to go on and pay this $40,000,000 for this property, and have all these controversies go on for perhaps ten years?

Mr. SPOONER. We are not going to pay any $40,000,000 until we get a good title.

Mr. MITCHELL. If all that has to be done before we get a good title it will be ten years before the question of good title can be determined.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator frightens me. [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad of it.

Mr. SPOONER. I have recovered. Of course, the Senator knows that we will not pay $40,000,000 for this property without a good title.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope not.

Mr. SPOONER. I am glad the Senator has even hope. He knows, too, that that must be within a reasonable time. He knows that ten years or five or three years or one year, in all human probability, would not be regarded by the President of the United States as a reasonable time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Now wait. Does the Senator think that outside of an insane asylum there is a man in France who would appeal from an order or decree that gives him a share in $24,500,000, and 20,000,000 francs besides, in order to get that reversed, so that he can get nothing?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will answer the Senator on that point that some of these men in France, even if they are a little insane, might be of opinion that, inasmuch as for long months the company insisted that their property was worth $109,000,000 and now they have gone and sold it for $40,000,000, therefore they have been swindled; and they are very likely to come in and make a contest.

Mr. SPOONER. When they will all know that the only purchaser to whom they were trying to sell it at a hundred and nine million dollars is the same individual, Uncle Sam, who is willing to pay $40,000,000?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will not interrupt the Senator any more.

Mr. SPOONER. They will know perfectly well that there is no other purchaser under the sky. I want to say, then, closing on this branch of the case, that I do not see any good reason to doubt that they can furnish a good title.

In the first place, this property can be reconveyed to the liquidator, and no Senator who ever practiced law will say that in such a case the court can not order the liquidator to sell and save as much as possible to the cestuis que trust, to the great body of the creditors and stockholders; and no lawyer will deny that such a sale will pass a good title, free and clear of all incumbrances, leaving the creditors and stockholders to contest in the courts over their respective shares to the proceeds of the sale. With the distribution of the money by the court or the time it will take we will have no concern.

It can be done in another way. This corporation, in its articles of organization, as I said, approved by the court, has the right to dissolve without any regard to solvency or insolvency. It has the right, by vote of its stockholders, to dissolve, to cease to exist, to wind up its affairs through a liquidator. I have no doubt—the Senator may have doubt; he does not seem to have doubt about anything relating to Nicaragua, but he has doubts about everything relating to the Panama route—I have no doubt that when the liquidator of the new company is appointed to wind it up under its charter, and the liquidator of the old company, under the authority of the court, joins the liquidator of the new company in a transfer of this property to the United States, it will carry a good title. But if it does not—and there are lawyers in the United States who can ascertain that fact—then this bill means the Nicaraguan Canal.

The Senator from Oregon even objected to this purchase because of the infinite stench that surrounded the old company—the odor of corruption and scandal and bribery—and he said, "If we buy this property we will become a participant in all this scandal and fraud and bribery." Did the Senator mean that? I have heard of "covenants running with the land, but I have never heard that principle applied to "odors" and "stenches," and the ill reports of former owners.

The Senator might just as well say that if I buy a rendering establishment, which is very offensive, in order to burn it down and build a residence upon the site, the "smell" would "run with the land," and that I become a participant in the "malodorous" rendering business. He might with just as much propriety say that if I purchase a house which has been used as a gambling house, and pay money for it to erect a church or a hospital upon the site, I become a participant in the business of the former owner. He might just as well say if the Government ownership of—and heaven save the mark—railroads and public utilities gets to be the rule in this country, the Government of the United States could not acquire the Union Pacific because it would become a participant in the scandals of the Credit Mobilier.

If we get that title, a good title, from the courts, we get it clean. We are not buying stock of the old company. We are not buying stock of the new company. We are simply buying certain physical properties. If we get a good title to it, we will own it. We will own it by an honest purchase. We will own it for an honest use and a patriotic use, and our title will be as clean as that of the Government to this Capitol.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. I am about through.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg to refer the Senator to page 175 of Mr. Pasco's deposition, which sets out the latest arrangement that has been made by the court and by the liquidator of the old company and by the president of the new company, by which the contract between the old company and the new is rescinded and changed, the property is conveyed back to the liquidator of the old company, and the liquidator of the old company makes M. Bo, the president of the new company, the agent or attorney to sell to the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. That clarifies it. I was not aware of that.

Mr. MORGAN. I knew the Senator was not.

Mr. SPOONER. I thank the Senator, as I have had occasion to thank him many times for suggestions.

I suggested that in this way it might be done; that the property might be conveyed to the liquidator, the contract with the new company canceled, and then by order of the court the title made from the liquidator to the United States. The Senator from Alabama says that has been done. There are several ways in which it may be done.

Mr. MORGAN. This arrangement, which has been approved by a court in France—they approve everything that comes along—has conveyed all the property back to the liquidator of the old company, and the president and board of directors of the new company are made the agents of the old company to sell it to the United States. That leaves the question whether when it gets back into the old company, as it has gone there, those liens and equities do not attach to it just as if the former contract had never been made. It has been rescinded.

Mr. SPOONER. If that be true, it would not get "back into the old company," it would go to the liquidator, and the court still has the same power that it had before to sell it free and clear of liens. The court in the first place had the power to transfer it to the New Panama Company free of the old liens. Otherwise, however, much it might advantage the estate to do so, the court would be powerless—that is not the law anywhere, I think. It would be a beautiful idea to organize a new corporation to carry on a great work with no credit, taking the property from an old, broken-down, bankrupt concern, loaded with all the debts——

Mr. MORGAN. That is why I said, in answer to the question of the Senator from Wisconsin when he asked me if the title could be obtained to this property, "Yes; but not on existing facts." It would have to be changed, because the old contract has been rescinded and the property is now in the hands of the liquidator, and the question of its being sold free of incumbrance has not been mooted or decided. It is an open question which yet remains to be decided.

Mr. SPOONER. There are several open questions that remain to be decided.

Mr. MORGAN. That one is important.

Mr. SPOONER. There are some open questions about Nicaragua that remain to be decided——

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. As well as about the concessions which we get from Colombia. There are open questions yet about Costa Rica. We are not to be frightened by open questions. If the property is in the hands of the liquidator the court has the power—every equity court in the world has—to sell it free and clear of liens.

Mr. MORGAN. But the court has never so decreed. That is what I mean. The court has never so decreed.

Mr. SPOONER. Then because the court has not so decreed, the court can not ever so decrees?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not said that.

Mr. SPOONER. If the court can so decree and does so decree, what is the matter with that situation?

Mr. MORGAN. There is nothing the matter with it except it puts the canal under the embarrassment of infinite lawsuits. That is all.

Mr. SPOONER. All those infinite lawsuits would be in France, over the purchase money which as a substituted asset went into the registry of the equity court. The notion that those people, all parties to that suit, represented by counsel appointed by the Government as well as by counsel chosen by themselves, can, after the French court has ordered the liquidator to sell the property free and clear of liens and convey it to the United States, fight over their share of the proceeds in the court where they are, and after the estate is wound up and the distributions are all made and the final decree entered, can run away from their French jurisdiction and come over here and pester my friend the Senator from Oregon is quite absurd.

But, Mr. President, I shall spend no more time on that point. I believe we can get a good title, but if we can not, then it means Nicaragua, and that is what the Senator thinks will happen under my bill.

Mr. MORGAN. What I think we both want.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator will not say that.

Mr. MORGAN. I mean——

Mr. SPOONER. Because if I agreed with the Senator I would not offer the substitute for all the world.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not mean that the Senator desires the Nicaragua Canal in preference to the other, but that he wants the Nicaragua Canal if he can not get this.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. MORGAN. I want it whether we can get the other or not.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the difference. I want the canal just as much as the Senator from Alabama does, and I want, in one way or the other, a bill to be passed here under which we will get a canal. There never was greater need for it than now. The Oregon demonstrated one thing to our people, and the "community of interest," which has locked together the transcontinental railroads of this country, will find, better than any legislation, in the years to come a "rate regulator" in this canal, whether it is built at Panama or built at Nicaragua.

The Senator from Alabama has had a good deal to say about these protocols. I do not understand them as the Senator does. He seems to think that we owe something to the memory of President McKinley in our action here with reference to these protocols. What do we get by the protocols? The Senator says we get the right under the protocols to build a canal from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean. I say we get no such right under the protocols.

Mr. MORGAN. There is a difference of opinion.

Mr. SPOONER. That is all I mean to call it—a difference of opinion.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. The protocols were entered into while the Commission was investigating under the act of Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. The protocols were entered into by the President the very next day after the Commission made its preliminary report.

Mr. SPOONER. It had not made its full report.

Mr. MORGAN. It had made its preliminary report, which was a better report than it has ever made since or before.

Mr. SPOONER. It was a better report because it was the Senator's way.

Mr. MORGAN. It was. It was a decision in favor of the Nicaragua route, and the report having been made on the 30th day of November, the President on the 1st day of December entered into negotiations with these two Republics and signed and sealed and delivered these papers. I do not consider that they were trash.

Mr. SPOONER. Nobody could ever make me believe that President McKinley intended by these protocols to try to take away from Congress the right to choose the route for an isthmian canal.

Mr. MORGAN. Not by any means, because he expressly in the protocols themselves refers it to Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. Nor to anticipate the final report of the Commission. Now, what is the protocol?

It is agreed between the two Governments that when the President of the United States—

Not to take effect at once. There is a condition precedent to it——

Mr. MORGAN. Of course.

Mr. SPOONER. Which never has happened.

Mr. MORGAN. We are trying to get it to happen now.

Mr. SPOONER. If you get it to happen you will not be any further on so far as the protocol is concerned, in my judgment.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg to say that if we pass the Hepburn bill, that contract is as good as any contract ever signed, sealed, and delivered in the world, and Costa Rica and Nicaragua have both recently and formally and officially signified their adherence to it and their request that Congress may confirm it.

Mr. SPOONER. There are many things formally done on this question that we do not know about.

Mr. MORGAN. I have informed the Senate of it by putting documents into the RECORD covering every word of it.

Mr. SPOONER. What is this?

It is agreed between the two Governments that when the President of the United States is authorized by law to acquire control of such portion of the territory now belonging to Nicaragua as may be desirable and necessary on which to construct and protect a canal of depth and capacity sufficient for the passage of vessels of the greatest tonnage and draft now in use, from a point near San Juan del Norte on the Caribbean Sea, via Lake Nicaragua to Brito on the Pacific Ocean, they mutually engage—

No grant of any right down to there; is there? Mutually engage to do what?—

to enter into negotiations——

Mr. MORGAN. To do what?

Mr. SPOONER:

to enter into negotiations with each other to settle the plan and the agreements, in detail, found necessary to accomplish the construction and to provide for the ownership and control of the proposed canal.

It is a mere proposition that when the President is authorized by law to acquire that route, they will enter into negotiations with him as to the terms on which he can get it. Nothing is agreed except to endeavor to agree.

Mr. MORGAN. That is right; but they have already pledged themselves that he shall have the right——

Mr. SPOONER. Where?

Mr. MORGAN. In that protocol.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I do not find it.

As preliminary to such further negotiations it is forthwith agreed that the course of said canal and the terminals thereof—

As to which this negotiation is to proceed—shall be the same that were stated in a treaty signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain on February 5, 1900, and now pending in the Senate of the United States for confirmation, and that the provisions of the same shall be adhered to by the United States and Nicaragua.

That treaty was never ratified, and therefore was never adhered to.

Mr. MORGAN rose.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not make any point on that.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope not, because I put before the Senate in official statements that they make no point at all about the fact that this treaty was not ratified, because the treaty subsequently ratified carries out the agreement so far as they are concerned.

Mr. SPOONER. I fail to see any right granted by Nicaragua in that protocol except the right to negotiate with Nicaragua when the President is authorized to acquire that route. That is the thinnest acquisition of a diplomatic sort upon which to build up a great fabric that I think ever was discovered. Is there any time limit to it?

Mr. MORGAN. A reasonable time necessarily is the limit, for the reason——

Mr. SPOONER. There is no time limit.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Wisconsin would not assert that any nation on earth could be permitted, after that protocol was signed, sealed, and delivered, to interfere and get a similar contract with Costa Rica and Nicaragua. The Government of the United States would not have permitted it.

Mr. SPOONER. I assert that if this substitute is adopted and it is found that we can not acquire the property of the New Panama Canal Company, or if it is found that we can not acquire the requisite concessions from Colombia, this substitute will in that event authorize the President to acquire control of the Nicaragua route and to construct a canal upon it.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator say that the condition precedent will not then have been performed?

Mr. MORGAN. I will say this, that it will not have been performed, because instead of going to Nicaragua and Costa Rica, as that treaty provides, and obtaining the right, we go to Colombia first and try to obtain the right, and thereby we release Nicaragua and Costa Rica from all of that obligation. Mr. McKinley had the right, as he knew perfectly well, to make the negotiation without an agreement by stipulation with Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

Mr. SPOONER. I am sorry——

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me just one second.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg pardon.

Mr. MORGAN. If we pass your substitute we release Costa Rica and Nicaragua from the obligation which Mr. McKinley had agreed they should be bound by, with which no government in the world could interfere.

Mr. SPOONER. I am sorry the Senator says that it releases Costa Rica and Nicaragua. I do not think it amounts to anything in the world, because they will negotiate with us and we will negotiate with them when occasion requires.

Mr. MORGAN. They are small, and we can assume everything.

Mr. SPOONER. We can safely assume that.

Mr. MORGAN. I am afraid not.

Mr. SPOONER. We contingently, by this substitute, authorize the President to acquire control of the Nicaragua route, and the moment the contingency happens it makes it his duty to acquire control if he can. I contend that this protocol, so far as there is any life in it—I think it was merged when they proposed this treaty here—and I think so far as Costa Rica is concerned it never had any life, for I can not conceive——

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will permit me, I will read him an extract from a note which I received a few moments ago from the minister of Costa Rica. He says:

It gives me pleasure to confirm the information given you by telephone that I am instructed by my Government to sign a treaty on the same terms substantially as proposed by the United States.

Mr. Hay proposed it. I suppose he got it all right.

Mr. SPOONER. Have they changed their constitution?

Mr. MORGAN. They must have, because he is instructed by his Government to sign a treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know anything about this except that I find here——

Mr. MORGAN. I know the Congress is in session, and that question has been up, and I take it for granted they have made the necessary change, if there was any needed. There never was any necessity for a change, in my judgment.

Mr. SPOONER. That may be, but they construe their own constitution.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is perfectly right. Now they have made the construction, and that government has authorized its minister here to sign the treaty on this subject that Mr. Hay proposed to them. I suppose Mr. Hay is taking care of the United States pretty well.

Mr. MITCHELL. How late is that?

Mr. MORGAN. It was handed to me a half hour ago.

Mr. SPOONER. Diplomatic notes are coming around so fast

it is difficult to keep up with them. I know that the Secretary of State informed us, under date of May 15, that Costa Rica has decided that before entering into negotiations it was necessary for them to adopt a constitutional amendment, and he referred to the message of President Iglesias, in which the President, when addressing the Congress by message, says:

This committee has discharged its duties in a satisfactory manner touching all the points which in its opinion do not contravene the spirit of our political institutions; in conformity to the provisions of the fundamental code as regards the integrity of the territory and the exercise of sovereignty. In consequence thereof the Government is powerless to enter into positive negotiations with that of the United States of America unless there should be previously passed a constitutional amendment by which such concessions for the construction of the interoceanic canal may be authorized, or the matter referred to public opinion in some other way by calling a constituent assembly for the purpose.

That is the message of the President to his Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. The Congress of Costa Rica has assembled regularly since that time, and is in session now. I was informed that it had the subject of this provision before it, and it evidently passed the provision and regulated matters so as to conform to the opinion of the Administration, and this note comes to me from Mr. Calvo this morning, while we have been sitting here talking. He says:

It gives me pleasure to confirm the information given to you—

That is, to me—

by telephone that I am instructed by my Government to sign a treaty in the same terms substantially as proposed by the United States.

So that difficulty is all out of the way. We need not worry ourselves about it. I never myself had any concern about it.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to say this to the Senator: I am not mentioning it as against the feasibility of the Nicaragua route.

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. SPOONER. The question as to the Maritime Canal Company's concession is a serious one. The question whether that concession was lawfully forfeited is a serious one.

Mr. MORGAN. That has lapsed entirely.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, not lapsed.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; in point of time.

Mr. SPOONER. That does not lapse.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. What I mean by that is this: Of course the time has run, but if the grantor of a franchise upon a condition subsequent by its own act prevented the performance of that condition the condition is gone.

Mr. MORGAN. That was a suit between private persons, where there was a judge to decide between them.

Mr. SPOONER. No; that was a suit between a citizen of the State of New York, as I recollect it, and the State of Texas.

Mr. MORGAN. That may be so.

Mr. SPOONER. Practically.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; the State might have been a party.

Mr. SPOONER. That was where there was a grant of lands made by the State of Texas to aid in the construction of a railroad——

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I remember the case.

Mr. SPOONER. Upon condition that within a given time the road should be completed, and before the company could much perform the war for the Union came on and Texas, of course, turned her fortunes with the Confederacy.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, we know that the Maritime Canal Company has neither any more power nor any more right now to proceed under the concession from Nicaragua or Costa Rica than a man who has been dead for years.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me—I am not urging this against the Nicaragua route as an insuperable objection to it. I think if we choose the Nicaragua route we will get that and every other obstacle out of the way. But it is an obstacle. It must be got out of the way. If a franchise is illegally forfeited by the grantor, the time does not run while that illegal forfeiture bears down and breaks down the credit of the holder of the franchise.

The case which I had partly stated when interrupted by the Senator is the case of Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall., 203. There, as I stated, the State of Texas had joined the Confederacy. After the war the State provided by its constitution that all the public lands theretofore granted for the benefit of railroads or railway companies should be appropriated to other purposes. The bondholders of the land-grant company filed a bill to prevent the execution of this constitutional provision, as impairing the obligation of the contract entered into between Texas and the railway company, by which the land was granted to aid in the construction of the railroad upon condition, among others, that it be completed within a given time, which time had expired.

They claimed that as the State by joining the Confederacy and going into war had rendered it impossible to perform the condition within the time, that it had lapsed, and that the grant, upon the strict principles of the common law, had become absolute. The Supreme Court fully sustained this contention, and it is the universal principle as to grants between individuals upon condition subsequent. The court held that it applied just as much to a sovereign grantor as to an individual grantor, but that it being an equity suit the court would not enforce the strict rule of the common law but would allow the railway company a reasonable time within which to perform this condition.

Of course the forfeiture of the Nicaragua franchises may turn out to have been valid. In other words, that ground existed at the time for the forfeiture; but that remains yet to be determined.

Mr. MORGAN. I paid no attention to these alleged incumbrances upon Nicaragua and Costa Rica, because the Isthmian Canal Commission were instructed to investigate the subject, and they reported upon it fully and say there is no incumbrance in the way. I thought I could stand on that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin in what way it has been suggested that Nicaragua has acted illegally?

Mr. MORGAN. In debate.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Hay claims, and the Senator from Alabama claims, in forfeiting this franchise, declaring it void.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was a declaration——

Mr. SPOONER. No; it was an act.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was a declaration in pursuance of a provision in the charter.

Mr. SPOONER. No, sir; it was an act of the Nicaraguan Congress which forfeited it, passed without giving them any hearing at all and in violation of the provision in the charter, and they proceeded to confer the same franchise upon other people. The Senator from Alabama in a report, and it is the law, well sustained by abundant authorities, reported to the Senate that it was unlawful because that thing could not be done without office found or its equivalent, without some judicial ascertainment of the fact. These people are entitled to have their day in court. That will have to be gotten out of the way.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very glad——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SPOONER. I can not refuse, but I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. MORGAN. Just a moment. I am very glad to make my acknowledgment to the Senator for what he says about my having found one question of law and stated it correctly.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not intimated that the Senator does not usually do that.

Mr. MORGAN. But the Senator omits to notice another proposition that I stated here the other day, and which, of course, qualifies the statement I made at that time, that both Costa Rica and Nicaragua are stockholders in this company, and the question is between stockholders of the Maritime Canal Company, and can not possibly be between the United States and Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not contend for a moment that the question was between the United States and the stockholders, but if we accept a franchise from the Government while one is outstanding granted to others, unlawfully forfeited, then we have to deal with Nicaragua, and if it is decided that it is a lawful franchise; if the time has not run, as it has not, unless it has been lawfully forfeited, then a grant to the United States or to all the governments of the earth would be powerless in law to destroy that franchise in any court that administers justice. But all that will be worked out.

Mr. President, I must yield the floor. Other Senators are to speak. I have shared the floor cheerfully with all who have sought it, and thus have limited myself to an incomplete discussion of salient phases of this great subject. I wish it might have been otherwise. I do not see any good reason to doubt that we can obtain title and the necessary concessions from Colombia, and I firmly believe that the adoption of this substitute will promote the public good.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend myself to take more than a few moments on this bill. It is rather a remarkable condition that we are in. We seem to be in great haste to pass a bill authorizing the President of the United States to build a canal somewhere on the Isthmus. It would seem to me at least that we ought to have had a little preparation for this bill. We ought at least to know that we have the authority to build a canal on one of these proposed routes. It seems to me that we have not now. We have not anything from the Nicaraguan Government or from the Costa Rican Government that will allow us to build on that line. Whatever we do there we must still negotiate with those two Governments.

I suppose we are in a little better shape on the Panama route, because we might possibly consider ourselves to be the successor of the French company and go on, perhaps, and yet I believe nobody is satisfied with the arrangement with reference to the Colombian Government, if we are going to build that canal.

Mr. President, that is about the way this question has been handled now for the last fifteen years. It is just about seventeen years since we began to be actively concerned about building a canal somewhere on the Isthmus. We have in that period had several bills before the Senate which have been voted on. I think if one of those old bills was called up and we would look it over, any Senator here now would be astonished that he ever voted for it. I think, like the Senator from Wisconsin, he would be surprised that he had ever given such a vote.

In the first place the canal would not have been good for anything if we had built it. There has not been any proposition here before to build a canal that would at all meet the demands of commerce or anything like it. There was just as much haste, I remember, several years ago to get a vote. We were told then that the American people were demanding a canal, and that we were derelict in our duty that we did not vote for it at once.

Mr. President, I have not any question in my mind but that the majority of the American people who have thought of it expect that at some day we are going to build a canal across the Isthmus; but I do not believe the American people have formed any decided opinion where that canal is to be built, and if you would submit it to them they would determine the question by saying, "We want the best possible route. What route will give us the best canal?"

There is not any sentiment about the Nicaragua Canal, because they have been talking of it for the last fifteen years. They could not talk very much about anything else. The Panama route was beyond our reach. That canal was in process of being constructed by the French people most of the time, and when that enterprise broke down it broke down in such a disastrous way that nobody wanted to touch it for a time at least. Yet there is nothing in its past history that need prevent us from taking that route and building the canal, if it is the best place to build the canal. That is the question for us to determine now.

This canal will be built. It will not be built in the next six months, nor will it be begun in that time. It will be some time before it is begun. There will be time enough to settle the question whether we are to get a good title to the Panama route, if the Senate thinks that is the preferable route, as I have not much doubt it will. It seems to me that that route ought to be selected, and I think we shall be able to get a good title. If not, we will fall back upon what I believe to be the inferior route, the Nicaragua route.

Mr. President, I have not voted for the Nicaragua route, and I have never made a speech in favor of it, yet I have said I suppose a dozen times in the Senate that I knew it was desirable to build a canal some time across the Isthmus and that it would certainly be built. I have myself had a decided opinion in favor of the Panama route from the time the conference met in Europe and determined on selecting that route. The engineers of the world were there, and all agreed that a sea-level canal would be the best; and all the European engineers agreed that the Panama route was the best on which to build it. Our American engineers objected to the Panama route on two grounds. One was its great expense and the other was of course the difficulties which they foresaw in a sea level or any other canal at that point. I think the engineering talent of the world was with the French people when they commenced that canal.

Mr. President, the question for us to determine is, Which route is preferable, which will be the best canal, which will accommodate the commerce of the world most certainly? Several years ago I went over with a great deal of care the difficulties on the Nicaragua route. They are so great that it is with a good deal of hesitation you can say that it is a feasible route. Of course you can spend money enough on any route to build a canal if you want to do so. We are now told that a canal on the Nicaragua route can be built for a little less than $200,000,000. If any engineer will take the data which has been given to us by the Commission and get up here and say he believes it can be built for $189,000,000 I, at least, shall be surprised. There are a great many things not considered in that connection that are to be taken into account; and of course it is a guess when you talk about what it is going to cost. I have heard some engineers say that it would cost $400,000,000. I have heard others say it would cost $500,000,000. Now, that is a guess. It is morally certain, in my judgment, that $200,000,000 will not build either the Panama Canal or the other canal.

When either canal is built there will be difficulties in operating it. One canal would be practically four times as long as the other. I venture now to say that no one here knows what the difficulties to be encountered with the Nicaragua Canal would be. On the other hand, the Panama Canal has so far been under the observation of engineers and there has been so much work done on it that it is hardly possible that any considerable surprise can be met with in building that canal. The dangers such as always confront an engineer when he comes to make his calculations on a great work of this kind have been practically made known, while on the other route we know nothing about them.

There is not any question but that a canal one-fourth as long as the other is a better canal, so far as distance goes, at least. If the Panama Canal was built to-day and the other canal was built to-day, does anyone believe that any considerable portion of the commerce of the world would seek the long canal? Then you ought to consider, what I am afraid we have not considered very carefully, the difficulties that we are to encounter in maintaining the long canal. It is about four times as long, and that there will be more than four times the amount of difficulty I do not suppose any engineer will deny. I believe it is agreed that it will cost $1,350,000 more to maintain it. That is the capitalization of $67,500,000.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator does not mean that that has been agreed to by the friends of the Nicaragua route?

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. MORGAN. We have discarded that idea all the time.

Mr. TELLER. But it is so declared by the Commission; and I believe if you could take the consensus of opinion of the engineering profession of the country they would tell you that that was probably an underestimate instead of an overestimate of the difference between these two routes.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that we examined Mr. Harvey, who built the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, and Mr. Cooley, who built the Chicago Drainage Canal, and they differed entirely with regard to this estimate, of which no items were ever furnished by the Commission at all. There is not an item to show the basis of these estimates. On the contrary, the items are kept out of the report.

Mr. TELLER. I do not expect the Senator from Alabama would agree to anything that the Commission determined or anything that any engineer determined which is not in favor of the Nicaragua route.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I am not quite as blind as that. I am pretty old and I may be pretty blind, but I am not as big a fool as that would make me.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Alabama, of course, is very much in favor of the Nicaragua route. It is possible that he sees the difficulties, but I hardly think he sees some that engineers see. The Commission whom we sent out to determine the question as to the route, with the exception of one member, were agreed in the advantages of the Panama route over the other, and I do not think myself that they have exaggerated the advantages at all. I think, on the contrary, they have minimized them. I think myself that the advantages are decidedly greater than even the Commission have stated in their report.

Of course, I understand that the public mind has been attracted to this one canal route simply because, for the last seventeen years, you could not talk about any other. From the time the French commenced their work until a few months ago there was no probability at least that we would be able to secure that canal. We are told by the Commission that while they first reported in favor of building the Nicaragua Canal they reported in favor of it because the Government could not get an opportunity to build on the other line.

Mr. President, I am not an enthusiastic person on this canal. I do not believe it will accomplish as much as a great many people believe, and yet I know very well that there is a sentiment in this country that will demand the building of a canal. I should regret very much to see the American people take an inferior route because of any sentiment or any prejudice that might exist against the other line. I listened to the discussion between the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] about the title to the canal. Mr. President, there can be no question about making a perfect and complete title if we want to do so. If that is the best route to build a canal on, we ought to take pains to make title to that route and not to the other.

I know I have been put down as an enemy to the canal. I have said repeatedly that when the Government of the United States got ready to build a canal, and to build it in the right place, and to build the right kind of a canal, I would be glad to give it my vote. I did not vote for a one-horse canal, such as was proposed here a few years ago, when we were told that it could be built for $65,000,000. I do not want now to vote for a canal that has its locks only 740 feet long. I know very well that the locks ought to be a thousand feet long, and they ought to be 100 feet wide. I have every reason myself to believe that if we authorized the building of this canal, that will be the result. It ought to be big enough to take in any ship in the world, and we know now that there are ships already being built that would not go through a 740-foot lock.

I saw it stated the other day that there are 20 large ships afloat that can not go through the Suez Canal. A few years ago one of the best engineers in the country, an engineer who has now passed away, published a little work on this very question, as to what should be the length of the locks of this canal. He went on to show the growth of the shipping of the world in the last twenty-five years, and he declared that it would be but a few years before we would be building ships a thousand feet long. Every indication is that he was correct in his estimate. But we are not bound by this bill to build locks of any fixed size. Of course the Commission has recommended 740 feet. It will be in the power of the President, I understand, when the Government gets ready to build the canal, to build locks of a thousand feet, if that is the opinion of the engineers of the country, and I have no doubt it will be. I do not object to that now.

I intend to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. I am free to say that with my present knowledge I would not vote to build a canal on the Nicaragua route. If I had to make my selection of voting against a bill or voting for that route, I should vote against it. I do not believe it would be ever a satisfactory canal if it was built. I believe the other will have some surprises and some difficulties, but not a tithe of what the Nicaragua route would present. If the Panama Canal is not a success, I shall be morally certain that the other would not be.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I offer two amendments intended to be proposed by me to the Spooner substitute for the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, I stated in discussing this question at an earlier day that I had been led to convictions from facts and proofs furnished which appealed to my judgment and reason. During the time this bill has been before the Senate I have still continued my effort in the direction to secure, if possible, any new light or to confirm what I had already believed. I know there are many things in connection with this question, technically and otherwise, that have not been fully understood by many Senators. I know that many of us are apt to leave to others the investigation of matters of this kind and then depend upon the argument or the reports from which to arrive at our own conclusions.

I have heard statements made during this debate which made me feel called upon to confirm not only statements made by myself, but reports made from the Isthmian Canal Commission. Listening to the arguments on the part of those who talk from a technical standpoint, seeming to raise a questionable doubt as to whether or not the Commissioners themselves might have been mistaken, or, possibly, whether we misunderstood them, led me to make a list of questions and submit them to those within easy reach so that I might have the answers by this time.

We are seeking the truth; we are looking for facts to justify what may be our action, and I know of no better place to look for facts that are reliable and will guide us in that action than to appeal to the men who, under the order of Congress to the President, were selected for their fitness and their ability and their integrity—the Commission appointed by the President of the United States, servants of the people and of the Government—to use their experience, their ability, and their talents to enable us to exercise the best judgment possible upon this all-important subject.

To get that information I thought it best to make the questions simple and direct.

It will be seen that these questions cover the whole range of the debate and are the controlling points in the whole subject. I am sure that Senators will be glad that they were boldly and squarely asked.

What were the answers? These I have only received this morning upon my return to the city. They are written separately and from the respective homes of the gentlemen—Messrs. Walker and Pasco, from Washington; Messrs. Noble, Burr, and Morison, from their separate offices in New York; Colonel Hains, from Baltimore, and Colonel Ernst, from Chicago.

I have grouped the answers of each member in connection with each question, and I will read them to you just as they have come to me. These are my written questions and the exact written answers from each member so addressed. I have the original autograph replies of each of these gentlemen, which I am prepared to submit:

Senator HANNA'S question No. 1. In making the isthmian canal report of January 18, 1902, recommending the adoption of the Panama route, was your decision arrived at only because a cost of purchasing and completing the Panama Canal is less than the cost of constructing the Nicaragua Canal?

Answer of Admiral Walker. The difference in cost of purchasing the rights, property, and unfinished work of the Panama Canal Company and completing that canal and of constructing the Nicaragua Canal had very little weight in causing me to decide in favor of the Panama route.

Answer of ex-Senator Pasco. The mere difference of five or six million dollars between the cost of constructing the Nicaragua Canal and of purchasing the rights, property, and unfinished work of the New Panama Canal Company and finishing the Panama Canal did not control my decision in favor of the report made by the Isthmian Canal Commission January 18, 1902.

Answer of Mr. Noble. I desire to say that in joining in the recommendation of the Panama route by the Isthmian Canal Commission I gave the relative estimated costs by the Panama and Nicaragua routes little weight because they are nearly identical. The smaller relative cost of maintenance and operation and the shorter canal line and consequent risks to ships by the Panama route were the main considerations, the first named being in my opinion the more weighty.

Answer of Mr. Morison. The matter of cost was one and among the least important of several considerations which influenced me. I signed the report of November 16, 1901, with great reluctance and only because I considered the price named by the representative of the French company so exorbitant, coming as it did after a series of procrastinating delays and unsatisfactory correspondence, that it could only be rejected as unworthy of consideration; that in spite of the advantages of the Panama route, the United States Government could not afford to put itself in the position which the acceptance of the terms proposed in behalf of the French company involved.

Answer of Colonel Hains. My decision in determining that the Panama route for an isthmian canal was the best one that could be adopted was not alone because the cost of purchasing and completing the Panama Canal is less than that of constructing the Nicaragua Canal.

Answer of Professor Burr. My decision was not reached for the sole reason that the cost of purchasing and completing the Panama Canal was estimated to be less than the cost of constructing the Nicaragua Canal, although the difference in favor of the Panama route was an element in my decision.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. It was not.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 2. If not determined by that consideration only, what considerations did determine your decision in favor of the Panama route?

Answer of Admiral Walker. I consider the Panama route superior to that of Nicaragua because it is much shorter, has easier curves, and is consequently safer for shipping; the difficulties of construction are much better known, the land along the route is nearly all owned by the company, the property will come to the United States with a clear title, and therefore there are practically no probabilities of expenses not estimated for by the Commission, while the cost of maintenance and operation is estimated at $1,300,000 less per year than that of a canal by Nicaragua.

Answer of ex-Senator Pasco. The concluding chapter of the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission of November 16, 1901, contains a statement of the engineering, physical, and general advantages of the Nicaragua and Panama routes for an isthmian canal. An examination of this statement makes it manifest that the Commission regarded the Panama route as the most feasible and practicable, but it was not recommended because the New Panama Canal Company, which controlled the route under concessions from the Colombian Government, submitted to the Commission no offer which it deemed reasonable to sell its property to the United States.

After this report was submitted, an offer was made by the company, with the consent of the Colombian Government, which removed this objection and made an entire change in the situation.

The company agreed to sell all of its property, whether on the Isthmus or in Paris, to the United States for $40,000,000. The liquidator, or receiver, who represented the interests of the old company in the property, acting under the authority of the court which appointed him, consented to the sale and I regarded a title from the company and the receiver, approved and confirmed by the court and made with the consent of the Government of Colombia, as valid and sufficient. The price was that fixed by the Commission as the actual value of the property.

The decision arrived at by me was based upon all these considerations: The advantages of the Panama route specified in the report of November 16, 1901; the satisfactory price at which the Panama Canal could be purchased, and the proffer of a title which, when completed according to the plan proposed, would pass all the interests in the property to the United States and make the transfer absolute and complete.

Answer of Mr. Noble. The smaller relative cost of maintenance and operation and the shorter canal line and consequent risks to ships by the Panama route were the main considerations—the first named being, in my opinion, the more weighty.

Answer of Mr. Morison. I considered that the Panama route had advantages over the Nicaragua route in cost of construction, in cost of operation, and in convenience when done, while its use was less likely to lead to local international complications. By substituting a definite and reasonable offer for its previous procastinating and unreasonable methods the French company had entirely changed the situation and placed the United States Government in the position where it could honorably select what was in all other ways the best route.

Answer of Colonel Hains. The considerations that determined my decision in favor of the Panama route are:

(a) Shorter length of canal.
(b) Fewer and less difficult obstacles to be overcome.
(c) A more thorough knowledge of the physical difficulties.
(d) The less total amount of curvature.
(e) The more moderate degree of curvature—that is, the greater proportionate length of canal that approaches a straight line.
(f) The lower summit level. It will be necessary on the Nicaragua route to raise and lower ships to a vertical height of 104 feet, while at Panama the lift is only 82 feet, an advantage of 22 feet in favor of Panama. Moreover, the height could be still further reduced at Panama, but it can not be reduced at Nicaragua.
(g) The greater ease with which the level of Lake Bohio can be regulated as compared with Lake Nicaragua. The level of Lake Bohio is regulated automatically and water taken from it for regulation is taken at a distance from the sailing line, whereas in Nicaragua the regulation is necessarily affected by a system of sluices worked by man, and the water, instead of being taken from the lake direct, is taken through a long stretch of river which is used by navigation. This will produce currents in some of the bends, which navigators would prefer to avoid.
(h) The largely diminished cost of maintenance.
(i) The belief that if the United States builds a canal at Panama a canal in competition would never be built anywhere else.
(j) Because the actual time of transit will be less.
(k) Because the dangers of temporary obstruction are less in proportion ot the length of the canal.
(l) Because a railroad is already constructed and fully equipped.

And that railroad parallels the Panama Canal.

Answer of Professor Burr. My decision was largely, if not chiefly, affected by the substantial preponderance of the physical or engineering advantages of the Panama route over that in Nicaragua, as set forth in the two reports of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. After giving due consideration to the question of cost, my decision in favor of the Panama route was based upon the fact that, in my judgment, it would be the better canal after completion. My reasons for this opinion are that the Panama Canal is shorter, is straighter (that is, has less curvature), and has a lower summit level (that is, fewer locks).

One measure of this superiority is that the time required to pass through the Panama Canal would be twelve hours, while that required to pass through the Nicaragua Canal would be thirty-three hours of continuous steaming, which would probably mean, for large vessels, three days. This advantage counterbalances, in my judgment, the advantage which the Nicaragua Canal possesses in its greater proximity to the United States.

Another measure of the superiority of the Panama Canal is the cost of operation, which is $2,000,000 per annum, against $3,350,000 per annum for the Nicaragua Canal, and another would be, if we could obtain satisfactory figures, the difference in the insurance rates, which would undoubtedly be lower for the shorter canal.

The above are the more important considerations which govern my choice. The minor ones are the present existence of a railroad and a seaport at each end; also the fact that in purchasing the present canal and railroad we would purchase nearly all of the land required for the right of way, making it unnecessary to resort to condemnation proceedings. Both of these considerations will avoid considerable delay in beginning the work, and the latter one may avoid a large addition to the total cost of the canal.

Another consideration is that a sea-level canal in the future is possible on the Panama route and not on the Nicaragua route. And still another is that we know the ground better; that is, our estimates are more reliable at Panama than they are at Nicaragua.

It would, in my opinion, be to the advantage of the United States to buy and finish the Panama Canal even at a cost considerably greater than that of building the Nicaragua Canal, supposing always that we can obtain the necessary rights and privileges from the Colombian Government.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 3. Is it practicable to make the Panama Canal a sea-level canal?

Answer of Admiral Walker. I believe it to be practicable to make the Panama Canal a sea-level canal.

Answer of ex-Senator Pasco. I do not claim to speak with authority upon engineering problems, but I have long been interested in questions relating to canal construction, both before and since my connection with the Commission, and have given them much thought and study. My opinion is that a sea-level canal can be constructed at Panama, but not at Nicaragua.

Answer of Mr. Noble. It is practicable to make the Panama Canal a sea-level route either before or after opening navigation through it, while a sea-level canal is practically impossible by the Nicaragua route.

I want to emphasize the statement of Mr. Noble. We all appreciate the advantages of having a sea-level canal, and it will be possible to change from a lock canal to a sea-level canal on the Panama route, and on that route only.

Answer of Mr. Morison. Yes. In my judgment the actual expenditure required to make the Panama Canal a sea-level canal would not be much more than that required to construct the Nicaragua Canal as a high-level canal. The objection to building the Panama Canal now as a sea-level canal is the time, probably from twenty to twenty-five years, which would be required for its construction.

Answer of Colonel Hains. It is practicable to make the Panama Canal a sea-level canal.

Answer of Professor Burr. It is entirely practicable to make the canal on the Panama route a sea-level canal.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. It is.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 4. Can this be done after construction as a lock canal?

Answer of Admiral Walker. I believe that a sea-level canal can be made after the construction of a lock canal.

Answer of ex-Senator Pasco. This can be done after its construction as a lock canal.

Answer of Mr. Noble. It is practicable to make the Panama Canal a sea-level route either before or after opening navigation through it.

Answer of Mr. Morison. It can be made a sea level while in use as a lock canal, but at a considerable increase of cost.

Answer of Colonel Hains. This can be done after construction as a lock canal, but in my opinion it never will be, because the disadvantage of locks is not sufficient to pay the cost of dispensing with them.

Answer of Professor Burr. It is also my judgment that it is practicable and feasible to make the canal on the Panama route a sea-level canal at any time in the future if it is constructed at first as a lock canal. This can be done by any one of several plans, one of which at least would involve certain adaptations of the plan for a lock canal to the ultimate change to a sea-level canal. Another plan would not require that adaptation. The first of the preceding plans of procedure would involve an increased first cost of the lock canal with less expenditure in the ultimate change to a sea-level canal, while the second plan of procedure would not necessarily involve any increase in the first cost of the lock canal, but a greater final cost in changing to the sea-level canal.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. It is.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 5. Is it practicable to make the Nicaragua Canal a sea-level canal?

Answer of Admiral Walker. It is not practicable to build a sea-level canal by the Nicaragua route.

Answer of ex-Senator Pasco. My opinion is that a sea-level can be constructed at Panama, but not at Nicaragua.

Answer of Mr. Noble. A sea-level canal is practically impossible by the Nicaragua route.

Answer of Mr. Morison. No.

Answer of Colonel Hains. It is not practicable to construct a sea-level canal in Nicaragua.

Answer of Professor Burr. It is not practicable to make the Nicaragua Canal a sea-level canal in consequence of its great length, involving enormous cost and a great period of time to construct it on that plan.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. It is not.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 6. Is the Bohio dam feasible and practicable of construction under the plans submitted by the Isthmian Canal Commission to Congress?

Answer of Admiral Walker. I believe the Bohio Dam to be feasible and practicable of construction as planned by the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Answer of ex-Senator Pasco. I have been present at all the examinations made at Bohio when the Commission visited Panama, and at all the discussions of the Commission upon this subject, and I regard the plans submitted in the report as feasible and practicable.

Answer of Mr. Noble. The Bohio Dam is feasible and practicable of construction under the plans submitted by the Commission.

Answer of Mr. Morison. It is entirely feasible and practicable to construct a dam which, when completed, will conform to the plans of the dam submitted by the Commission. I do not like this plan of a dam, as I consider that it involves unnecessary expense. The assumed necessity of cutting off any possible flow of water through a small deposit of sand and gravel at the bottom of a deep geological valley changes an otherwise simple, inexpensive structure into a costly one. The situation of this dam is absolutely unlike the situation of the Conchuda Dam on the Nicaragua route. The Bohio Dam will be far away from the river in a position where it will be unusually safe from destructive elements. The Conchuda Dam is directly across the San Juan River, where it will be exposed to all the violent hydraulic actions which endanger an overflow dam. The problem of the Conchuda Dam is simple, because it has only one solution, and that it is a solid masonry dam founded on rock. The problem of the Bohio Dam is less simple, because there are several possible solutions and room for difference of opinion as to which is the best. Conchuda is like a railroad through a canyon, where there is but one place to build a difficult work. Bohio is like a railroad across a rolling prairie, where much skill can be shown in selecting the best of several inexpensive lines.

Answer of Colonel Hains. The Bohio Dam, in my opinion, is entirely feasible and practicable of construction under the plans submitted by the Isthmian Canal Commission to Congress. I believe, however, that a less expensive dam is also feasible and practicable.

Answer of Professor Burr. It is entirely feasible and practicable to construct the Bohio Dam under the plans submitted by the Isthmian Canal Commission to Congress without resorting to any untried method or any means not regularly employed in engineering operations at the present day. This statement is based upon my own practical experience in foundation and other subaqueous construction by the use of methods and means contemplated under the plans of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. It is. One member of the Commission thinks that a satisfactory dam can be built on a different plan for less money, but he does not question the feasibility of the dam proposed by the Commission.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 7. Is the compressed-air method the only satisfactory, feasible, and reliable method of constructing a core wall down to the rock foundation?

This is the method which the experts on the other side have said is in its experimental stage to a depth below 115 feet, which happened to have been the deepest foundation heretofore required to have been built, and therefore, because it has not been done, they say it can not be done.

Answer of Admiral Walker. The compressed-air method is not the only feasible method of constructing a core wall at the site of the proposed Bohio Dam. There are other methods which I believe to be feasible, such as the freezing method, the dredging through wells method, and perhaps others.

Answer of ex-Senator Pasco. There are other methods which meet the approval of the engineer members of the Commission, and from what I have learned of their success elsewhere, I believe there are other feasible and reliable methods for constructing a core wall down to a rock foundation besides the compressed-air process.

Answer of Mr. Noble. The compressed-air method is the most satisfactory, feasible, and practicable one known for building the core wall from a rock foundation, but there are other methods by which an impervious wall could be built.

Answer of Mr. Morison. I have very great doubts of the practicability of the use of compressed air in the Tropics at the great depths which this plan involves.

Answer of Colonel Hains. The compressed-air method of sinking caissons is not the only satisfactory, feasible, and reliable method of constructing the core wall of the dam proposed by the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Answer of Professor Burr. The compressed-air method is not the only satisfactory, feasible, and reliable method of constructing the core wall.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. It is not, although I believe it to be entirely satisfactory.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 8. Besides the compressed-air method, are there other satisfactory, reliable, and feasible methods (such as the freezing method, the dredging-through-wells method, or other methods) for the construction of such core walls?

Affirmative answer of Admiral Walker. Included in his answer to question 7.

Affirmative answer of ex-Senator Pasco. Included in his answer to question 7.

Affirmative answer of Mr. Noble. Included in his answer to question 7.

Answer of Mr. Morison. There are many methods available. The well-dredging method has been in use for centuries in India, and has been applied both in India and Australia to sinking foundations beyond the accepted limits of compressed air. The freezing process is comparatively modern, but there is no question whatever of its being applicable to this case. I also believe that the effect of a core wall in cutting off seepage could be obtained very cheaply by grouting the sand and gravel with a paste of Portland cement, forced down under pressure, or possibly by a line of iron sheet piling driven with the use of water at high pressure.

Answer of Colonel Hains. Besides the compressed-air method, there are other satisfactory, reliable, and feasible methods for the construction of such core walls.

Answer of Professor Burr. There are a number of methods besides that of compressed air by which the core wall can be put in place, as indicated by the plans of the Commission, in a satisfactory manner, one well-known method being that of dredging through open wells, or, as it is sometimes called, the open dredging method. The freezing method can also be employed. There are at least two or three practicable and satisfactory methods besides that of compressed air, although it is my judgment that the latter method, properly adapted to the situation at Bohio, is preferable. It can be so used as to keep the pressure of the compressed air materially below pressures heretofore used in that class of work.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. I have no doubt that either the freezing method or the method of dredging through wells could be successfully applied.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 9. In respect to the effect of earthquakes upon any canal, which structure is the safer one for a dam, viz, a dam constructed entirely of concrete masonry or a dam constructed of earth?

Answer of Admiral Walker. In case of an earthquake of ordinary strength, I believe that both a dam of concrete masonry and one of earth would probably be safe; but in case of an earthquake of extraordinary violence, much would depend upon the direction of the wave movement. It would seem to me, however, that the earth dam would be the safer of the two.

Answer of ex-Senator Pasco. The report of the Commission says, upon the subject of earthquakes in connection with the construction of an Isthmian Canal: "The works of the canal will nearly all of them be under ground. Even the dams are low compared with the general surface of the country, and with their broad and massive foundations may be said to form part of the ground itself, as they are intended to do. The locks will all be founded upon rock. It does not seem probable that works of this kind are in any serious danger of destruction by earthquakes in a country where lofty churches of masonry have escaped with a few minor injuries." In this I concur.

Answer of Mr. Noble. I consider a properly designed concrete dam, or an earth dam, with a core wall, safe against such moderate earthquakes as may be expected either at Panama or at Nicaragua, and a dam wholly of earth somewhat less so.

Answer of Mr. Morison. I should have no fears of either class of dams in an earthquake, provided it was carefully built and of sufficient horizontal dimensions.

Answer of Colonel Hains. In respect to the effect of earthquakes upon a dam, my opinion is that a dam constructed of earth is safer than one constructed entirely of masonry.

Answer of Professor Burr. It is my judgment that on neither route is there sensible danger of injury by earthquakes to such a substantial engineering work as a great dam, but I consider a dam constructed of earth as less liable to injury than a dam constructed entirely of concrete masonry.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. An earth dam would undoubtedly be subjected to less danger from an earthquake than a masonry dam.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 10. In view of the recent volcanic disturbances in the West Indies, do you consider that there is danger from volcanic action to the canal by the Panama or Nicaragua routes? If so, please state your views thereon.

Answer of Admiral Walker. No one can foretell the chances of volcanic disturbances, but in view of the recent volcanic outbreaks in the West Indies, I consider the danger from such outbreaks to a canal for the Nicaragua route, which passes through a region of volcanoes—some of them in Lake Nicaragua and near the canal line—as much greater than that by the Panama route, which is far removed from volcanoes, either active or extinct.

Answer of ex-Senator Pasco. There are no volcanoes upon or near the Panama route. The nearest is Chiriqui, in Costa Rica, about 180 miles from Colon, near the boundary line between that Republic and Colombia. In Nicaragua a line of volcanic peaks and craters extends along the western side of the country to within a few miles of the proposed canal line. Several of these are upon or near Lake Nicaragua. An outburst from any of these, such as has occurred at other places, might change the physical features of the lake and adjoining section of country and render it entirely unfit for canal purposes. Such an outburst occurred in Coseguina, one of the volcanoes in this range, in 1835.

In 1880, in Lake Ilopango, about 5 miles east of the capital of the adjoining State of Salvador, an outburst resulted in the upheaval of rocks above the surface of the lake where there had formerly been deep water. A huge column of vapor 1,000 feet high arose from the lake, the island of rocks increased in size, and when the eruption terminated had an area of 5 acres and a height of 160 feet.

While such disturbances might not occur again in this region, they are possible at any time where so many sources of danger of this character exist, for recent experience has shown that volcanoes may become dangerous neighbors even when pronounced by scientists as inactive.

Answer of Mr. Noble. As to danger from volcanic eruptions, the danger must be greater in Nicaragua, where volcanoes exist near the canal line, than in Panama, where there are none; but the danger is too small, even in Nicaragua, to be a serious factor in the choice of routes.

Answer of Mr. Morison. I see no reason to apprehend any danger from volcanic eruptions anywhere on the Panama route. I know of no place in the world where there is more danger of volcanic eruptions than along the Nicaragua route. These eruptions have hitherto occurred under conditions in which we have had very imperfect information about their terrible effect and no reference was made to them in the report of the Commission. The recent disasters in the West Indies in locations where such a thing was certainly no more probable than in Nicaragua have changed this condition. To build the Nicaragua Canal in the full light of what we have just seen at Martinique and St. Vincent would be an act of unparalleled recklessness.

Answer of Colonel Hains. In view of the recent volcanic disturbances in the West Indies, the dangers to a canal from volcanic action are greater on the Nicaragua route than on the Panama route.

Answer of Professor Burr. Inasmuch as there is no volcano either on the Panama route or within 175 miles of it, there can be no danger to canal structures on that line from volcanic action. On the other hand, there are a considerable number of live volcanoes in Nicaragua and Costa Rica, one of which, Ometepe, is within about 10 miles of the Nicaragua route. It may be an open question how much damage would be done to the Nicaragua Canal if Ometepe should be subject to a violent eruption as that which has recently taken place at Mont Pelee, on the island of Martinique, but that danger would exist is beyond question. I do not believe that even such danger would be sufficient either to prevent the construction of the Nicaragua Canal or to necessitate any material change of course involving great cost if no other route were available; but considering this feature of the case only, the Panama route possesses the substantial advantage of being free from all danger of volcanic action.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. I consider the danger from the direct action of volcanoes extremely remote, so remote that it is to be considered only if necessary to decide between two lines of which all other conditions are exactly equal.

There can be no question in the mind of anyone, I think, that the danger from earthquakes is far greater than that from volcanic overflow. The Commission concluded that the danger from the former was not great enough to prevent the building of the canal. Having satisfied their minds upon that point, they felt it unnecessary to discuss the minor danger in their report. If they could have anticipated that the public mind would be excited on the subject as it has been by the recent occurrences in the West Indies, they would no doubt have said something about it.

There is no volcano within 175 miles of the Panama line, and accordingly there is no danger of direct volcanic overflow for that line.

The volcanoes nearest the Nicaragua line are Ometepe and Madera, the former active and the latter supposed to be extinct, which rise out of Lake Nicaragua, the former about 11 miles and the latter about 6 miles from the direct sailing line laid down in the lake for vessels using the canal. The depth of water on the sailing line varies from 40 to over 100 feet, and between Madera and the sailing line there is a depth of 200 feet. The shortest distance from either volcano to the canal proper is over 13 miles. The sailing line can be altered so that by a slight detour 40 feet depth can be carried past these volcanoes, coming nowhere nearer than 13 miles. Now, he would be a rash man who would say that there can never be an eruption which will fill all this up. All I have to say is that, personally, I believe there is no more danger of that than there is of a volcanic convulsion which will split the Isthmus across from sea to sea and save us the trouble from building the canal at all.

I am not prepared to say that that will never happen, but I should not hesitate to build in anticipation of the one any more than of the other. What has happened in Martinique, if it had happened at Ometepe or Maderia, would not have destroyed the canal. As I read the newspaper accounts, it would have diminished some of the surplus depth in the lake, and perhaps some of the ashes might have been carried as far as the canal itself in quantities sufficient to reduce the depth of that a foot or two, but not more. Business would no doubt have been frightened away temporarily, but the canal itself would have remained essentially intact. If the Nicaragua line was superior to the Panama line in other respects, I should not leave it on account of volcanoes.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 11. By the plans adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission, and recommended to Congress, is the Chagres River absolutely and safely regulated and controlled?

That is an important question, and a great deal has been said about it.

Answer of Admiral Walker. The plans adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission provide for regulating and controlling the Chagres with absolute safety.

Answer of ex-Senator Pasco. I believe that the Chagres River can be absolutely and safely regulated and controlled by the plans adopted by the Commission.

Answer of Mr. Noble. In my opinion the plans of the Commission provide absolutely for the safe regulation and control of the river Chagres and leave no serious question in regard to the feasibility or practicability of an isthmian canal by way of the Panama route.

Answer of Mr. Morison. I consider that it is absolutely controlled and regard these plans as one of the most satisfactory solutions that I have ever seen of a problem of this kind.

Answer of Colonel Hains. Under the plans adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission, the Chagres River is, in my opinion, safely controlled, though I prefer to reduce the effects of freshets by the construction of a dam at Alajuela, thus creating a basin above it into which nearly 50 per cent of the rainfall can be impounded. This will render the control of the Chagres more satisfactory, and there will be no sediment deposited in Lake Bohio from that stream.

Answer of Professor Burr. The plans adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission, and recommended in its reports, insure absolutely the certain and safe control and regulation of the Chagres River in all its stages, whether in the highest floods or in the driest seasons. This is accomplished by measures so simple that they can not possibly fail or be deranged.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. It is, absolutely. The topography of the country lends itself to a very beautiful solution of that problem. The control is complete, and, what is better, it is automatic.

Senator HANNA'S question No. 12. Are there any engineering features of the Panama route which are not feasible or practicable, or concerning which there is any serious question?

Answer of Admiral Walker. There are no engineering features by the Panama route which are not practicable and feasible, or about which there is any serious question.

Answer of Ex-Senator Pasco. In my judgment, the engineering features of the Panama route are feasible and practicable. The work is one of vast proportions, but I believe all the difficulties it presents can be overcome.

Answer of Mr. Noble. In my opinion, the plans of the Commission provide absolutely for the safe regulation and control of the River Chagres and leave no serious question in regard to the feasibility or practicability of an isthmian canal by way of the Panama route.

Answer of Mr. Morison. There are no important features of the Panama route which are not feasible and practicable. No great work is ever considered which does not involve several solutions of more than one important problem. This is the case on both routes. The Panama route has been developed almost to the point of absolute construction, and it would be hard to find a work of this magnitude in which there are less elements of doubt.

Answer of Colonel Hains. There are no engineering features on the Panama route which it is not feasible or practicable to overcome, or about which there is any serious question.

Answer of Professor Burr. As indicated in full detail in the reports of the Isthmian Canal Commission, there are no engineering features whatever of the Panama route which are not entirely feasible or practicable, or about which there is any serious question as to their practicability or feasibility.

Answer of Lieutenant-Colonel Ernst. There are none whatever.

I have imposed upon the Senate's time and patience by reading those statements in order that every Senator who has any doubt about the report of the Commission as to the feasibility and practicability of the construction of the Panama or the Nicaragua route can understand that there is none by either route.

Then we come to the simple question for which a canal is construced—that of operation. A great deal has been said with reference to the feasibility of operating sailing vessels through the Panama Canal, owing to the doldrums in Panama Bay. I submitted the other day a report from 82 masters of steamships and sailing vessels, 10 of them masters of sailing vessels who had operated in all parts of the world and knew about the questions which we are discussing. Without a single exception, as the record will show, the reports were favorable to the Panama route. Yet, in the face of the statements of those experts it has been claimed that sailing vessels will be debarred from the use of the Panama route.

Mr. President, I claim that sailing vessels are likely not to use either canal to any great extent, whichever is constructed, because the cost of towage and the cost of tolls will more than overcome the saving of time and will eat into the profits of owners to such an extent that they will have the ships go around the Horn in preference to using certainly the Nicaragua route. I have in my hand a telegram received June 12. I will read it:

> Practically the entire sailing interests, both masters and owners, are unanimous in agreeing that the only route for the sailing vessel is by Panama.
> F. S. PENDLETON,
> President Atlantic Carriers' Association, 48 South street, New York.

I do not know the gentleman. I know there is such an association. The telegram came during my absence and was sent to me of their own volition.

Mr. President, just a word in regard to the operation of sailing vessels. Those who know anything about this question know that to handle a sailing craft of large dimensions in any canal is a very difficult proposition. We will take the Nicaragua route. Entering the harbor of Greytown, the first thing the ship would have to do would be to secure a tug or two tugs. As it proceeds west through the canalized part of the canal it will be contending with a 3 to 4 knot current; it will be contending with the trade winds, blowing from the east all the time and part of the time across the breast of the canal.

With the sharp curvature and the number of curves, in my judgment it would require two tugs to take a vessel into Lake Nicaragua. If the price of towing is what I estimate it will be, to tow the 186 or 187 miles, or call it 200 miles in round numbers, taking the vessel clear of the harbor, in addition to the tolls required on account of the extra cost of maintaining the canal on the basis of these reports, which is $1,300,000 more than at Panama, the cost would be so expensive to the vessel that in my judgment she would prefer to go around the Horn.

But supposing that is not so, what is the comparative operation of a sailing vessel in going through the Panama and going through the Nicaragua Canal? You start in at Colon with a tug, and it is 47 miles of canal steaming. Call it 50 miles, if you will. The other is 200 miles. The amount of money you would have to pay to take a vessel through the Nicaragua Canal, calling it 200 miles to get clear of the harbor, would at Panama tow the vessel 150 miles out to sea, or a less sum would do it, because one is canal towage and the other 150 miles at Panama would be sea towage, which can be done in half the time, or less, and at half the cost.

But suppose the canal should be free? Suppose there should be no tolls, and simply the question of towage would come in? Then there would be more reason why the sailing vessel would take the shorter canal route and take the route where it could get the best service and the cheapest towage.

The question of insurance mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is an unknown quantity to estimate, but I want to emphasize the fact, with the knowledge I have about such questions, that with the Suez Canal rule no vessel or cargo would be insured within the limits of the canal, or else the rate would be abnormally high, and as you multiply the chance for accidents and delays by the difference in the distance it makes the rate four times as much by the Nicaraguan as by the Panama route.

The Senator from Alabama raised a question in his first speech with reference to what we were buying for $40,000,000. He made the statement that we had no inventory and therefore knew nothing about what we were getting for our money. The State Department has permitted me to bring here for to-day a volume which contains 15,000 items, being a complete inventory of every particle of machinery and everything else which the Panama Canal Company owned at the time it was made out. I simply produce the volume, which, of course, being a State Department document, is open to the inspection of any Senator, in order that Senators may satisfy themselves.

Now, in arriving at the value of what we are to purchase, I replied to the Senator from Alabama by submitting the report of the Commission as to the articles they enumerate upon which they placed a value aggregating $40,000,000. Everything else was omitted except what was in that statement. But this inventory shows that there are so many houses and hospitals and so much machinery and materials of all kinds, all the real estate of Colon, almost the entire city; all the properties of the railroad, schedules enumerated, estimated as having cost at a very low price to the French company over $25,000,000. That property the Commission ignored in its estimate, not that some of the materials and machinery can not be used, but they simply took the number of cubic yards of excavation that had been made, the stock of the railroad company, and some buildings and other assets there of more importance, and upon them based their figures. This book contains 342 pages, and, as I say, nearly 15,000 items.

Full testimony was furnished by the officers of the railroad company upon the call of the Commission regarding the property of that corporation. The property comprises the railroad across the Isthmus of Panama, which is first class and modern in every respect, with ample locomotives, cars, and other equipment; also a line of three passenger and freight steamships of American registry of approximately 2,000 tons net, with connections with regular steamship service between England, Germany, France, and South and Central American ports; wharves in New York, San Francisco, Panama, and La Boca; also the great pier at La Boca, near Panama, recently completed at a cost of over $2,000,000, and the finest pier on the South American Continent.

Also practically all of the city of Colon, with the annual revenue of about $20,000 from leased property therein.

Also an undivided half interest in the islands of Naos, Culebra, Pereco, and Flamenco, in the Bay of Panama.

Also the right of way in ownership over all the line of the railroad, and all terminal properties at Panama and Colon.

Also the business and traffic and good will of the route.

The total receipts of the railroad company are over $3,000,000 per annum. For fifty years it has continued operation without cessation and without default in a single penny. It has no floating indebtedness, and its cash balances in bank are something less than half a million dollars. Its board of directors is composed almost entirely of American gentlemen of high position in the commercial world.

The Commission fully considered the values of the canal and railroad properties in detail, and as inquiry has been made respecting the actual property we are to receive, I refer you to pages 100 to 103, inclusive, of the Commission's report of November 16, 1901.

The Commission finds this property worth at least the $40,000,000, and I consider this a low estimate. I am justified in that opinion not only by their report but by their statements before the committee, quoted in the minority report, and which show that they all agree that not only was the price reasonable, but it would have been to the advantage of the United States to have paid a much larger sum to have acquired the property.

Some question has been made concerning the allowance by the Commission for contingencies and omissions. As the French company had expended surely over $150,000,000 for this very property (aside from the waste of perhaps $100,000,000 more) and as they had continuously kept up the work and it is in full operation, this figure of $40,000,000 strikes me as very moderate.

But our Government has made even better terms, for it has secured in the offer other items which amount to a number of millions of dollars, and which are not included in the valuations of the Commission. These embrace buildings, land, etc., on the Panama Isthmus constituting the company's private estate, $1,137,000; hospitals at Colon and Panama, $868,500.

Nor does it include the value of an immense amount of machinery, consisting of floating plant, rolling stock, stationary and semi-stationary plant, many surveying and other instruments, office supplies and stationery, surgical and medical outfit, and miscellaneous supplies covering thousands of items and costing originally over $25,000,000. Nor do their estimates include any allowance for right of way, although the necessary lands are included in the offer.

The Panama Canal Company originally paid an enormous sum for these lands, all of which are charged off to profit and loss when taken into consideration by the Commission.

It is not unfair to say that these additional items of property not included in the estimate of the Commission are worth to this Government at least $6,000,000, and I think much more.

Even if the estimate of $40,000,000 be questioned because of certain allowances for contingencies and omissions (although such allowances are reasonable and customary), they are far more than offset by the immense amount of property included in the offer of the French company, but not included in the estimate of the Commission.

We are getting a bargain and we know it.

In the course of this debate remarks have been made connecting with this transaction the name of our late President, and the fear that a wrong impression may be left upon the minds of others as to what he may have done in connection with the canal leads me, I may say almost unwillingly, to introduce his connection with this subject.

As I understand, the Senator from Alabama made the claim that President McKinley had by his act connected himself directly with the choice of one of these routes—the Nicaragua route. I do not care to go into a discussion of that feature of it, except to state what I know to have been his opinion and that which governed him in what he did in connection with the canal. In common with all of us, as expressed not only upon the public platform but many times in his messages to Congress, he favored the construction of an isthmian canal, and in common with all of us he absorbed the sentiment of the Nicaragua route, because at that time no other canal was thought possible to be built by the people of the United State or by the Government of the United States. It was a subject which I discussed with him personally many times, and when this particular time arrived, by his own volition he introduced the subject, immediately following the investigation of the Panama route, I believe it was in 1898.

On November 18, 1898, the report of the Foreign International Commission, composed of the most eminent engineers of England, Germany, Russia, France, Colombia, and the United States, unanimously adopting plans for the completion of the Panama Canal, and showing that it was already nearly two-fifths completed, with several thousand men at work, was officially submitted to President McKinley.

The House persisted in the consideration of the Nicaragua Canal bills, but public hearings were had upon the Panama route sufficient to further advise Congress of the propriety and, indeed, imperative duty of examining the Panama and all other routes.

It was this information which had been furnished from this source that attracted the President's attention to the fact that while heretofore no other route but the Nicaragua could be considered as available, now another route presented itself. Apparently influenced by that information, he immediately, upon his own responsibility, instituted further investigation, and it was at that time, in personal intercourse with him, that he said to me: "We must not go too fast upon this canal question now. The interest of the country has been aroused, and here is a possible, if not a probable, opportunity for competition, and we do not know and we can not tell now upon which route we may decide to build."

After that Commission had been authorized by an act of Congress, and after he had been given the power to make the appointments, he was even more impressed that plenty of time and due consideration should be given to the subject commensurate with its importance. Again and again I heard him say that the information coming to him with reference to the Panama route and the opportunities which seemed possible as an outcome of adopting it made him feel the responsibilities in the selection of the Commission. I know how long a time he took to secure a knowledge of the men, the experts who were to decide for the people of the United States, under the authority given to him to recommend, in order that not only the personnel, but the ability and integrity of those men should be so far beyond question that their verdict would be acceptable to the people and put upon him the responsibility of adoption.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me a question? Did not that same Commission decide in favor of the Nicaragua route?

Mr. HANNA. I will answer that in a monent.

Mr. HAWLEY. It needs an answer.

Mr. HANNA. I wish to make another statement, not from the political standpoint nor in an offensive way. I will state that just before the Philadelphia convention President McKinley said to me, "It will not be wise to do as we have done in our platforms heretofore, to announce ourselves in favor of a Nicaragua Canal, because I am just now appointing a Commission to investigate the subject of all the routes, a Commission composed of men whose standing and integrity will make their report almost binding upon me and the country. So whatever their report will be will probably settle the question as to the route."

When the question about the Darien route was brought up, it was through President McKinley that my attention was first directed to it. I was here in Washington late in the spring a year ago when General Serrell, who is the advocate of this route, visited Washington, and, knowing the President, went directly to him and submitted the proposition and the suggestion of that route. He made so much of an impression upon the President that he sent him to me, with a request that I would carry on a further investigation of the matter and ascertain if all the surveys made by General Serrell could be verified. In fact, it was a tempting proposition. It was a sea-level canal by the construction of a tunnel.

The President was just as anxious to have that route investigated as he was to have either the Panama or the Nicaragua route considered, because it was his desire that the best route for a canal should be adopted. But it was ascertained and reported on that the Darien route was impracticable, that the construction of the tunnel was impracticable because of the volcanic status of the mountain, and the further fact that the Panama Canal Company owned the concession which covered the San Blas route.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. When the Senator refers to the Darien route as an impracticable route, I hope he will give it a little more time than I fear he will be able to do in his remarks here to-day. If you want to have a sea-level canal, and one that can be built in a short time and with one-third of the money that any other route would cost, you should take the Darien route.

Mr. HANNA. I want a sea-level canal myself.

Mr. SCOTT. You will get it by the Darien route without doubt, and without a lock or a dam.

Mr. HANNA. I presume that is true. Therefore, Mr. President, I make the statement that if any act of President McKinley has been construed to mean that he had any choice of routes for a canal, or that by any act of his he intended to indicate, or to direct, or to influence any person in that line in the choice of a route, I did not know it.

After the Panama Canal question had been brought to his attention, and from that time until last August, in conversing with him upon the subject many times the feasibility and practicability of the Panama route had grown upon him, as it has upon everybody else upon investigation. What the President wanted, and what we want, is the best canal. In all the arguments which I have heard upon the other side I have heard but very few Senators advocating the Nicaragua route, but those favoring the Nicaragua route have confined themselves to attempting to find some reason why the Panama route is not practicable and feasible.

When it comes to a choice as to physical or operating conditions what facts are to be observed? Do they consider it an advantage to have a canal as long as possible? Is a canal 183 miles long better than one 49 miles long? Are curves an attraction? Is a canal with 2,339 degrees of curvature better, in their opinion, than one with only 771 degrees? Do they believe that it is better to have 8 locks than 5? Do they suppose that because it will take three days to pass through the Nicaragua Canal and only one to pass through Panama therefore the former is better? Are they seeking the most expensive canal to build, and do they think that the $5,000,000 which at the very least it will cost to build the Nicaragua more than it will cost to build the Panama Canal an advantage for Nicaragua? Do they consider the Nicaragua Canal better than the Panama because it will cost $1,300,000 a year more to maintain? Unless they do consider that these things, or some of them, show the Nicaragua to be the better canal, I can not understand the basis for their position.

The Nicaragua Canal, they tell us, is feasible and practicable, and they point to the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission as proof of this. I accept their authority. But the same Commission has also declared the Panama Canal to be in every way superior to the Nicaragua Canal. I accept that statement, too. But the advocates of the Hepburn bill, while insisting that the Commission's report is conclusive on the former point, refuse to consider it of any value on the latter point. All that I can see to their logic is that anything which makes for Nicaragua is right and anything which makes against it wrong.

They will follow no expert of the highest rank, even, if he prefers any other plan to Nicaragua, but will desert him for anybody, no matter who, who expresses the opinion which they wish to hear—one in favor of Nicaragua.

There was a Mr. Cooley cited here the other day as a large contractor and engineer who had visited the Isthmus and made figures, which he refused to disclose, showing that the Nicaragua Canal, upon his statement, could be built for less money than the estimate. I have taken pains to find out about that gentleman. He is an engineer, and I believe a good one. He had to do with the drainage canal at Chicago, but did not complete it. He was elected a commissioner by the people on that canal and served there, but he never had a large contract in his life. So he is not a contractor. He went down to the Isthmus of Panama representing a syndicate in Chicago who wanted to build the canal in case that route was adopted. He made his figures from his own standard and his own estimate, which he declined to contribute to anybody else.

The other expert testimony which has been introduced into this question I cited the other day, that of Mr. Menocal, who was the originator of the scheme of the Maritime Canal Company, which failed, and several other engineers who have submitted their own opinions, by their own volition, I have no doubt, to members of the majority of the committee. If I read all the letters to the Senate that I have had from engineers over this country I think I could furnish a preponderance of testimony. But, Mr. President, I am relying upon the evidence and the testimony of the Board of Commissioners who were selected by President McKinley under the authority of Congress to tell the people of the United States and the Congress which is the best route upon which to construct a canal by the United States.

When the committee went into the investigation I had no idea that other testimony was to be taken except that of the Commission. The Commission had made a partial report, which was in the hands of Congress, and a few days later came their supplemental report, closely upon the passage of the Hepburn bill in the House, which completely changed the whole status and presented the matter in a different light, not only to Congress, but to the people of the United States.

In considering that proposition I understand that it was the duty and privilege of our committee to bring before us the members of that Commission, who were called together again by the order of the President of the United States in order that they might consider the new condition presented by the difference in terms and submit it to him that it might be conveyed to Congress for their information. But instead of confining our inquiry to the members of that Commission, men were sent for from all over the country, and the mass of evidence which has been printed for the use of the Senate is filled with the testimony of men who upon their own statement knew but very little about this subject. I am free to say that I offered no such testimony and I discard all other than that furnished by the experts upon whom we were taught to believe we could rely to guide us to our decision.

Mr. President, I was not only surprised but pained to hear the statement made by several members on the other side that seemed, at least by insinuation, to cast reflection upon this Commission when the appeal was made that Senators should not be led to any conclusion through their influence or their report. What were they there for? Why did the United States Government spend a million dollars for the purpose of such an investigation? Why did the Commission go to France and examine carefully the drawings and maps and the notes of all the surveys that had been made of the Panama Canal route? Why were there put upon that Commission four distinguished engineers who had served upon the Nicaragua Commission, some of them twice? They went into this work prejudiced in favor of the Nicaragua Canal because they knew that route from long acquaintance, and they knew no other.

Those engineers, confronted by facts and figures, were absolutely convinced against their judgment, and carried with them the additional members, who, following the same examination, had come to the same conclusion upon the technique of this question, and, coming home hurriedly, they made a report that, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] says, was in favor of the Nicaraguan Canal. How foolish it is to keep repeating that proposition when it is in print in these reports. Every Senator who has read it knows that in that report they intended to say, and did say, that the Panama route was the best route for a canal, but under the conditions which surrounded it, what they considered the exorbitant methods employed by the president of the the company, M. Hutin, in dickering for it, they put that question aside, but fixed a price which was intended to go where it did go—to the headquarters of the company—as giving their ideas as to what this country could well afford to pay for the franchise.

Now, Mr. President, I am not disposed to criticise anybody upon this floor or anywhere else in the advocacy of a scheme which has grown to be dear to his heart from long and old association. I can appreciate how people can become attached to even a project, and become so absorbed in the success of it as to be prejudiced as against any other competitive line.

I note that this question of an isthmian canal—always called the Nicaraguan Canal by citizens of the United States—has grown to be a sentiment, and that sentiment would probably have ripened into a fact had not the present condition of things come about.

If we had built the Nicaragua Canal when the first efforts were made in Congress, we would have made a mistake. If we had built the second Nicaraguan Canal we would have made a still greater mistake, because on its completion it would have been obsolete; and even now, with all preparations made for a new canal which will carry through it the largest class of vessels extant, it may be too small in another decade. Who can tell?

So when this question is worked out practically I know that the United States Government could well afford an additional allowance of money rather than take the risk of making a canal too small. It can afford to expend an amount of money necessary even to build a sea-level canal, which is only practicable by the Panama route, and when the necessity arises—and I want to impress upon the minds of every man in this body the emphatic statement made by this Commission, every one of them that I have cited, that it is possible, practicable, and feasible—make the Panama Canal into a sea-level canal after it is completed, it requiring only the expenditure of more money.

I made the suggestion the other day that if we built the Panama Canal nobody else would build an isthmian canal like it, but if we finished the Nicaragua Canal it was not an unlikely proposition that some other country or people might seize upon and start to finish the Panama Canal. I believe it was my friend from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] who quoted what I said and said it was ridiculous that anybody would think of building a canal if the United States Government should build one. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] a day or two ago said the reason why we should build the Nicaragua Canal was that if we built the Panama Canal somebody else would be sure to build the Nicaragua Canal. Those two statements do not jibe.

In closing, Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator proceeds to close, as he was about to do, I should like to ask his views, which I understand he has not given to-day, upon the propriety of absolutely closing the door against any future consideration of the Darien route by the President or by any public authority.

I am not an expert in this matter and I am not qualified to deal with it, but I am compelled to vote upon it, as are all other Senators here. If I understand the proposition, it is that the Darien route is to be treated as absolutely impracticable, although the shortest, although a route which can be constructed at sea level, although the harbor advantages are excellent at both ends, because the character of the mountain to be penetrated makes tunneling costly and makes the support of the tunnel after it is penetrated so costly that the route is impracticable.

Now, does the Senator from Ohio think it is expedient that the President of the United States should not have the right of availing himself of the advice of his Cabinet and of the best expert assistance in the world to judge of old problems and of new problems that may arise?

I will state my difficulty about it, and it may be that the question is an unwise one. We have got, most of us, to follow somebody. I am pretty well satisfied in general on such things to follow my honorable friend from Ohio, if there was no other authority, but he would disclaim any desire that anybody should take anything on his authority.

Then those of us who are not competent to deal with the great engineering problems ourselves we have have got either to follow a committee of the Senate or of the House, which the Senator from Ohio certainly does not want us to do in this case, because he has been making a very powerful argument to dissuade us from doing that, or we have got to follow the President of the United States, who, as I said, has at his hand the best expert advice in the world. He is the greatest executive officer in the world and has all the engineers in the public service, the Army, the Navy, the Land Office, and the advice of his Cabinet on all legal and other questions. Now, what is the objection to putting into this measure when we pass it the authority for the President to see whether that Darien route is so absolutely impracticable, as the Senator says rather by a smile than by an argument he thinks it is?

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me just a moment?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I am very glad indeed to see that the Senator from Massachusetts is beginning to come around, partially at least, to my views as to the Darien route. Early in the session, in February, I introduced a joint resolution asking for an appropriation of $15,000 that this route might be properly investigated and a report had inside of sixty days. That joint resolution was reported back adversely. For the benefit of the Senator from Massachusetts I will state that the Engineer Department of the Government have had the rock this tunnel would have to be bored through examined, and it will carry 19 times the weight that is required to hold up the tunnel.

I think no reputable engineer will say that that tunnel can not be made. Certainly, the subway in New York to-day is a more difficult undertaking, I am told by practical engineers, than the putting of a tunnel through that range of mountains; and I claim this is possible. I introduced a joint resolution the other day authorizing the President to designate engineers to investigate this route without expense to the Government, the fund to be deposited with the Secretary of War to pay every dollar of the expense of investigation, in order to ascertain whether or not this is a feasible route.

In view of that, Mr. President, why will my friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and my friend from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] insist upon either one of these impracticable routes? They have to come in here and explain about curves, about locks, and about dams, while upon the Darien route we can have a sea-level canal after we have tunneled through the mountains.

Mr. HANNA. You would have a narrow subway.

Mr. SCOTT. You may call it either a subway or a tunnel.

Objection is raised on account of the difficulty of ventilation in that tunnel, and it is said that on that account it would be impossible to use it. That is all nonsense. We can ventilate that tunnel without any trouble. There is no question about that.

Certainly those who claim that the tunneling of this mountain is impracticable have not investigated the subject. I have it from as good engineers as we have in this country that it is entirely practicable. If the Senator from Ohio will pardon me one minute longer, I have had interviews with a gentleman who was for six years consul at Colon, who has been engaged in the coastwise trade on both sides of that Isthmus, who has gone over these routes, who has carried his freight up these rivers in boats, who is thoroughly familiar with the character of the country, and who can be called before this committee at any time, and he has stated to me that there is no man who is familiar with, or who has attempted to familiarize himself with these different routes, but who will say that the Darien route is the proper one on which to locate the canal.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio if he will be good enough to answer my question before this debate goes on? He was kind enough to let me put my question, but nobody seems willing to let him answer it.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator from Ohio will yield to me for a moment, I want to suggest to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] that I think I can point out a way in which he can have his scheme considered, and it is the only way—that is, for him, and as many Senators as he can get to act with him, to vote against the Spooner amendment, to vote against the Hoar amendment, and to vote against the Hepburn bill. Then the Senator probably will have an opportunity to have his scheme considered.

Mr. SPOONER. In other words:

"Will you walk into my parlor?" said a spider to a fly.

[Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to say in regard to the proposition submitted by my colleague [Mr. SCOTT] that I believe it is the best one which has yet been presented, and I believe it is the safest. I fully agree with him. I think such a tunnel for a ship canal as would be necessary at Darien can be easily constructed.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, replying to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I will say that the act creating this Commission gave them authority to examine all the routes on the Isthmus that they thought it worth while to examine. Some criticism was made that they did not go very fully into the examination of this route, but their report shows to the satisfaction of the committee that the volcanic rock, which was the formation of these mountain ranges, was of such a nature that a tunnel to be successfully built would be so expensive that it would be almost impracticable.

There was another reason, which perhaps was a little stronger than any engineering difficulty, and that was that the Panama Canal Company owned those concessions. If we get any concession to build on the San Blas route we have got to go to the Panama Company to get it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will permit me, that may be in the mind of the President an insuperable objection. Is the Senator not willing to allow the President the power to decide whether it is or not, and whether we can get that route?

Mr. HANNA. I might state that personally there is another reason why I have not encouraged the San Blas route, although I was considerably interested in it a year ago and was desirous of finding out all I could about it; but from the mere fact that I had the temerity to make a choice, after the fullest investigation, of the Panama route, I was charged as being opposed to the construction of any canal and that I have only espoused the cause of the Panama Canal in order that I might defeat the construction of any canal. Those charges and those insinuations have not been confined to me, but have been made as to other minority members of the committee. The charge has been made in open Senate, by insinuation, that it was rather curious that all those who seemed to be favoring the Panama route as the best and most feasible route were those who were known to be the opponents of any canal.

Mr. President, as I may not have again an opportunity to state it, I want to say now, in answer to the insinuations which have been made as to myself and my colleagues who have been forced to the conviction that we are right upon the proposition—even against the sentiment and the prejudice we all had originally in favor of Nicaragua—that the Panama route is the best and most practicable for the construction and operation of a canal; that it is a poor cause, and one badly in need of support, that will influence any zealous advocate of Nicaragua to insinuate that any Senator in this body could be influenced or inspired by such motives.

I had felt an interest in this question, Mr. President, because it was a practical one. The operation of canals was one of the few subjects with which in my business life I had become acquainted from experience in all directions. When the Panama route was called to my attention by President McKinley himself, I was asked by him to give it my personal attention and the best efforts of my experience. He made the further request that I should go on the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, that he might have the benefit of what I knew upon these subjects. I never intended to bring that into this debate. I never intended that that name should be conjured with to make votes or to cast back the insinuation that he had violated the dignity of his position and almost his oath of office in attempting to decide in advance of all action of Congress what route should be chosen. He never did so by act or intimation.

Mr. President, other arguments than those must be used by the partisans of the Nicaragua Canal if they expect to break through the defenses and the barricades of facts builded up here by the hands of the most experienced engineers in the United States, if not in the world, the chosen agents of the people and of Congress to guide us in the right direction. Better arguments than those must be used out of which to make capital or to change the opinions of those who are to decide this question. We want to decide it right, not from the standpoint of sentiment or of self-interest, but for the good of the whole people of the United States.

If we make no mistake when this canal shall have been builded it will be a magnificent monument to our country, but if we make a mistake it will be a very doubtful monument to our good sense and judgment.

I hope that all Senators will consider that there has been but one desire on the part of the minority of this committee, and that is to place before them for their information all the facts connected with this question which might influence and guide them to a correct judgment.

APPENDIX.

ANSWERS OF MEMBERS OF ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION AND LETTER OF SENATOR HANNA.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1902.

DEAR SIR: I desire to give the Senate the facts concerning the following points which have arisen in the course of the debate in the Senate on the Isthmian canal subject:

1. In making the Isthmian Canal Report of January 18, 1902, recommending the adoption of the Panama route, was your decision arrived at only because the cost of purchasing and completing the Panama Canal is less than the cost of constructing the Nicaragua Canal?
2. If not determined by that consideration only, what considerations did determine your decision in favor of the Panama route?
3. Is it practicable to make the Panama Canal a sea-level canal?
4. Can this be done after construction as a lock canal?
5. Is it practicable to make the Nicaragua Canal a sea-level canal.
6. Is the Bohio dam feasible and practicable of construction under the plans submitted by the Isthmian Canal Commission to Congress?
7. Is the compressed-air method the only satisfactory, feasible, and reliable method of constructing a core wall down to the rock foundation?
8. Besides the compressed-air method, are there other satisfactory, reliable, and feasible methods (such as the freezing method, the dredging-through-wells method, or other methods) for the construction of such core wall?
9. In respect to the effect of earthquakes upon any canal, which structure is the safer one for a dam, viz, a dam constructed entirely of concrete masonry or a dam constructed of earth?
10. In view of the recent volcanic disturbances in the West Indies, do you consider that there is danger from volcanic action to the canal by the Panama or Nicaragua routes? If so, please state your views thereon.
11. By the plans adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission and recommended to Congress, is the Chagres River absolutely and safely regulated and controlled?
12. Are there any engineering features of the Panama route which are not feasible or practicable, or concerning which there is any serious question?

Will you kindly, in answer, give me the facts.

Yours, truly, M. A. HANNA.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION, ROOM 79, CORCORAN BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., June 12, 1902.

Hon. M. A HANNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant and to say:

The difference in cost of purchasing the rights, property, and unfinished work of the Panama Canal Company and completing that canal and of constructing the Nicaragua Canal had very little weight in causing me to decide in favor of the Panama route.

I consider the Panama route superior to that of Nicaragua because it is much shorter, has easier curves, and is consequently safer for shipping, the difficulties of construction are much better known, the land along the route is nearly all owned by the company, the property will come to the United States with a clear title, and, therefore, there are practically no probabilities of expenses not estimated for by the Commission, while the cost of maintenance and operation is estimated at $1,300,000 less per year than that of a canal by Nicaragua.

I believe it to be practicable to make the Panama Canal a sea-level canal.

I believe that a sea-level canal can be made after the construction of a lock canal.

It is not practicable to build a sea-level canal by the Nicaragua route.

I believe the Bohio dam to be feasible and practicable of construction as planned by the Isthmian Canal Commission.

The compressed-air method is not the only feasible method of constructing a core wall at the site of the proposed Bohio dam. There are other methods which I believe to be feasible, such as the freezing method, the dredging-through-wells method, and perhaps others.

In case of an earthquake of ordinary strength, I believe that both a dam of concrete masonry and one of earth would probably be safe; but in case of an earthquake of extraordinary violence, much would depend upon the direction of the wave movement. It would seem to me, however, that the earth dam would be the safer of the two.

No one can foretell the chances of volcanic disturbances, but in view of the recent volcanic outbreaks in the West Indies, I consider the danger from such outbreaks to a canal by the Nicaragua route, which passes through a region of volcanoes, some of them in Lake Nicaragua and near the canal line, as much greater than that by the Panama route, which is far removed from volcanoes, either active or extinct.

The plans adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission provide for regulating and controlling the Chagres River with absolute safety.

There are no engineering features by the Panama route which are not practicable and feasible, or about which there is any serious question.

I am, very respectfully,

J. G. WALKER,
President of Commission.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION, ROOM 79, CORCORAN BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., June 13, 1902.

Hon. M. A. HANNA.
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to the inquiries contained in yours of the 10th instant upon the subject of the Isthmian canal, I have the honor to submit the following replies:

1. The mere difference of five or six million dollars between the cost of constructing the Nicaragua Canal and of purchasing the rights, property, and unfinished work of the New Panama Canal Company and finishing the Panama Canal did not control my decision in favor of the report made by the Isthmian Canal Commission January 18, 1902.

2. The concluding chapter of the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission of November 16, 1901, contains a statement of the engineering, physical, and general advantages of the Nicaragua and Panama routes for an Isthmian canal. An examination of this statement makes it manifest that the Commission regarded the Panama route as the most feasible and practicable, but it was not recommended because the New Panama Canal Company, which controlled the route under concessions from the Colombian Government, submitted to the Commission no offer, which it deemed reasonable, to sell its property to the United States.

After this report was submitted an offer was made by the company, with the consent of the Colombian Government, which removed this objection and made an entire change in the situation.

The company agreed to sell all of its property, whether on the Isthmus or in Paris, to the United States for $40,000,000. The liquidator, or receiver, who represented the interests of the old company in the property, acting under the authority of the court which appointed him, consented to the sale, and I regarded a title from the company and the receiver, approved and confirmed by the court and made with the consent of the Government of Colombia, as valid and sufficient. The price was that fixed by the Commission as the actual value of the property.

The decision arrived at by me was based upon all these considerations—the advantages of the Panama route specified in the report of November 16, 1901; the satisfactory price at which the Panama Canal could be purchased; and the proffer of a title which, when completed according to the plan proposed, would pass all the interests in the property to the United States and make the transfer absolute and complete.

3 and 5. I do not claim to speak with authority upon engineering problems, but I have long been interested in questions relating to canal construction, both before and since my connection with the Commission, and have given them much thought and study. My opinion is that a sea-level canal can be constructed at Panama, but not at Nicaragua.

4. This can be done after its construction as a lock canal.

6. I have been present at all the examinations made at Bohio when the Commission visited Panama, and at all the discussions of the Commission upon the subject, and I regard the plans submitted in the report as feasible and practicable.

7 and 8. There are other methods which meet the approval of the engineer members of the Commission, and from what I have learned of their success elsewhere I believe there are other feasible and reliable methods for constructing a core wall down to a rock foundation besides the compressed-air process.

9. The report of the Commission says, upon the subject of earthquakes in connection with the construction of an Isthmian canal:

"The works of the canal will nearly all of them be underground. Even the dams are low compared with the general surface of the country, and with their broad and massive foundations may be said to form part of the ground itself, as they are intended to do. The locks will all be founded upon rock. It does not seem probable that works of this kind are in any serious danger of destruction by earthquakes in a country where lofty churches of masonry have escaped with a few minor injuries."

In this I concur.

10. There are no volcanoes upon or near the Panama route. The nearest is Chiriqui, in Costa Rica, about 180 miles from Colon, near the boundary line between that Republic and Colombia.

In Nicaragua a line of volcanic peaks and craters extends along the western side of the country to within a few miles of the proposed canal line. Several of these are upon or near Lake Nicaragua. An outburst from any of these, such as has occurred at other places, might change the physical features of the lake and adjoining section of country, and render it wholly unfit for canal purposes.

Such an outburst occurred in Coseguina, one of the volcanoes in this range, in 1835.

In 1880, in Lake Ilopango, about 5 miles east of the capital of the adjoining State of Salvador, an outburst resulted in the upheaval of rocks above the surface of the lake where there had formerly been deep water. A huge column of vapor 1,000 feet high arose from the lake, the island of rocks increased in size, and when the eruption terminated had an area of 5 acres and a height of 160 feet.

While such disturbances may not occur again in this region, they are possible at any time where so many sources of danger of this character exist, for recent experience has shown that volcanoes may become dangerous neighbors even when pronounced by scientists as inactive.

11. I believe that the Chagres River can be absolutely and safely regulated and controlled by the plans adopted by the Commission.

12. In my judgment the engineering features of the Panama route are feasible and practicable. The work is one of vast proportions, but I believe all the difficulties it presents can be overcome.

Very truly, yours,

SAMUEL PASCO,
Member of Isthmian Canal Commission.

NEW YORK, June 12, 1902.

Hon. MARK A. HANNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 10th instant, I desire to say that in joining in the recommendation of the Panama route by the Isthmian Canal Commission I gave the relative estimated costs by the Panama and Nicaragua routes little weight, because they are nearly identical. The smaller relative cost of maintenance and operation and the shorter canal line and consequent risks to ships by the Panama route were the main considerations, the first named being in my opinion the more weighty.

It is practicable to make the Panama Canal a sea-level route, either before or after opening navigation through it, while a sea-level canal is practically impossible by the Nicaragua route.

The Bohio dam is feasible and practicable of construction under the plans submitted by the Commission. The compressed-air method is the most satisfactory, feasible, and practicable one known for building the core wall from a rock foundation, but there are other methods by which an impervious wall could be built.

I consider a properly designed concrete dam or an earth dam with a core wall safe against such moderate earthquakes as may be expected either at Panama or Nicaragua, and a dam wholly of earth somewhat less so.

As to danger from volcanic eruptions, the danger must be greater in Nicaragua, where volcanoes exist near the canal line, than in Panama, where there are none; but the danger is too small, even in Nicaragua, to be a serious factor in the choice of routes.

In my opinion, the plans of the Commission provide absolutely for the safe regulation and control of the river Chagres, and leave no serious question in regard to the feasibility or practicability of an isthmian canal by way of the Panama route.

Very truly, yours,

ALFRED NOBLE,
Member of Isthmian Canal Commission.

ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION, ROOM 79, CORCORAN BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., June 12, 1902.

Hon. MARCUS A. HANNA,
21 Lafayette Square, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have received your letter of the 11th making inquiries concerning certain points which have arisen in the course of the debate in the Senate on the Isthmian canal, and send you the following replies:

Q. 1. In making the last Isthmian canal report of January 18, 1902, recommending the adoption of the Panama route, was your decision arrived at only because the price of purchasing and completing the Panama canal is less than the cost of constructing the Nicaragua canal?

A. The matter of cost was one and among the least important of several considerations which influenced me. I signed the report of November 16, 1901, with great reluctance and only because I considered the price named by the representative of the French company so exorbitant, coming as it did after a series of procrastinating delays and unsatisfactory correspondence, that it could only be rejected as unworthy of consideration; that in spite of the advantages of the Panama route the United States Government could not afford to put itself in the position which the acceptance of the terms proposed in behalf of the French company involved.

Q. 2. If not determined by that consideration only, what considerations did determine your decision in favor of the Panama route?

A. I considered that the Panama route had advantages over the Nicaragua route in cost of construction, in cost of operation, and in convenience when done, while its use was less likely to lead to local international complications. By substituting a definite and reasonable offer for its previous procrastinating and unreasonable methods the French company had entirely changed the situation and placed the United States Government in the position where it could honorably select what was in all other ways the best route.

Q. 3. Is it practicable to make the Panama canal a sea-level canal?

A. Yes; in my judgment the actual expenditure required to make the Panama canal a sea-level canal would not be much more than that required to construct the Nicaragua canal as a high-level canal. The objection to building the Panama canal now as a sea-level canal is the time—probably from twenty to twenty-five years—which would be required for its construction.

Q. 4. Can this be done after its construction as a lock canal?

A. It can be made a sea-level canal while in use as a lock canal, but at a considerable increase in cost.

Q. 5. Is it practicable to make the Nicaragua canal a sea-level canal?

A. No.

Q. 6. Is the Bohio dam feasible and practicable for construction under the plans submitted by the Isthmian Canal Commission to Congress?

A. It is entirely feasible and practicable to construct a dam which when completed will conform to the plans of the dam submitted by the Commission. I do not like this plan of a dam, as I consider that it involves unnecessary expense. The assumed necessity of cutting off any possible flow of water through a small deposit of sand and gravel at the bottom of a deep geological valley changes an otherwise simple, inexpensive structure into a costly one. The situation of this dam is absolutely unlike the situation of the Conchuda dam on the Nicaragua route. The Bohio dam will be far away from the river, in a position where it will be unusually safe from destructive elements. The Conchuda dam is directly across the San Juan River, where it will be exposed to all the violent hydraulic actions which endanger an overflow dam. The problem of the Conchuda dam is simple, because it has only one solution, and that it is a solid masonry dam founded on rock. The problem of the Bohio dam is less simple, because there are several possible solutions and room for difference of opinion as to which is the best. Conchuda is like a railroad through a canyon, where there is but one place to build a difficult work. Bohio is like a railroad across a rolling prairie, where much skill can be shown in selecting the best of several inexpensive lines.

Q. 7. Is the compressed-air method the only satisfactory, feasible, and reliable method of constructing the core wall?

A. I have very great doubts of the practicability of the use of compressed air in the Tropics at the great depths which this plan involves.

Q. 8. Besides the compressed-air method are there other satisfactory, reliable, and feasible methods (such as the freezing method, the dredging-through-wells method, or other methods) for the construction of such core wall?

A. There are many methods available. The well-dredging method has been in use for centuries in India, and has been applied both in India and Australia to sinking foundations beyond the accepted limits of compressed air. The freezing process is comparatively modern, but there is no question whatever of its being applicable to this case. I also believe that the effect of a core wall in cutting off seepage could be obtained very cheaply by grouting the sand and gravel with a paste of Portland cement forced down under pressure, or possibly by a line of iron sheet piling driven with the use of water at high pressure.

Q. 9. In respect to the effects of earthquakes upon any canal, which structure is the safer one for the dam; a dam constructed entirely of concrete masonry or a dam constructed of earth?

A. I should have no fears of either class of dam in an earthquake, provided it was carefully built and of sufficient horizontal dimensions.

Q. 10. In view of the recent volcanic disturbances in the West Indies, do you consider that there is danger to the canal by the Panama or Nicaragua routes from volcanic action? If so, please state your views thereon.

A. I see no reason to apprehend any danger from volcanic eruptions anywhere on the Panama route. I know of no place in the world where there is more danger of volcanic eruptions than along the Nicaragua route. These eruptions have hitherto occurred under conditions in which we have had very imperfect information about their terrible effect and no reference was made to them in the report of the commission. The recent disasters in the West Indies, in locations where such a thing was certainly no more probable than in Nicaragua, have changed this condition. To build the Nicaragua Canal in the full light of what we have just seen at Martinique and St. Vincent would be an act of unparalleled recklessness.

Q. 11. By the plans adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission and recommended to Congress is the Chagres River absolutely and safely controlled and regulated?

A. I consider that it is absolutely controlled and regard these plans as one of the most satisfactory solutions that I have ever seen of a problem of this kind.

Q. 12. Are there any engineering features of the Panama route which are not feasible or practicable or of which there is any serious question?

A. There are no important features of the Panama route which are not feasible and practicable. No great work is ever considered which does not involve several solutions of more than one important problem. This is the case on both routes. The Panama route has been developed almost to the point of absolute construction, and it would be hard to find a work of this magnitude in which there are less elements of doubt.

I trust that these answers give you sufficiently the facts which you ask for. If not I shall be very glad to give you any further information that I can.

Very respectfully, yours,

GEO. S. MORISON.

Hon. M. A. HANNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant (revised) propounding certain questions to which you desire answers. The questions and answers are as follows:

1. "In making the last isthmian canal report of January 18, 1902, recommending the adoption of the Panama route, was your decision arrived at only because the cost of purchasing and completing the Panama Canal is less than the cost of constructing the Nicaragua Canal?"

It was not.

2. "If not determined by that consideration only, what considerations did determine your decision in favor of the Panama route?"

After giving due consideration to the question of cost, my decision in favor of the Panama route was based upon the fact that, in my judgment, it would be the better canal after completion. My reasons for this opinion are that the Panama Canal is shorter; is straighter (that is, has less curvature); and has a lower summit level (that is, fewer locks).

One measure of this superiority is that the time required to pass through the Panama Canal would be twelve hours, while that required to pass through the Nicaragua Canal would be thirty-three hours of continuous steaming, which would probably mean, for large vessels, three days. This advantage counterbalances, in my judgment, the advantage which the Nicaragua Canal possesses in its greater proximity to the United States.

Another measure of the superiority of the Panama Canal is the cost of operation, which is $2,000,000 per annum against $3,350,000 per annum for the Nicaragua Canal; and another would be, if we could obtain satisfactory figures, the difference in the insurance rates, which would undoubtedly be lower for the shorter canal.

The above are the more important considerations which govern my choice; minor ones are the present existence of a railroad and a seaport at each end; also the fact that in purchasing the present canal and railroad we would purchase nearly all of the land required for the right of way, making it unnecessary to resort to condemnation proceedings. Both of these considerations will avoid considerable delay in beginning the work, and the latter one may avoid a large addition to the total cost of the canal.

Another consideration is that a sea-level canal in the future is possible on the Panama route and not on the Nicaragua route; and still another is that we know the ground better—that is, our estimates are more reliable at Panama than they are at Nicaragua.

It would, in my opinion, be to the advantage of the United States to buy and finish the Panama Canal even at a cost considerably greater than that of building the Nicaragua Canal, supposing always that we can obtain the necessary rights and privileges from the Colombian Government.

3. "Is it practicable to make the Panama Canal a sea-level canal?"

It is.

4. "Can this be done after construction as a lock conal?"

It can.

5. "Is it practicable to make the Nicaragua Canal a sea-level canal?"

It is not.

6. "Is the Bohio dam feasible and practicable of construction under the plans submitted by the Isthmian Canal Commission to Congress?"

It is. One member of the Commission thinks that a satisfactory dam can be built on a different plan for less money, but he does not question the feasibility of the dam proposed by the Commission.

7. "Is the compressed-air method the only satisfactory and reliable method of constructing a core wall down to the rock foundation?"

It is not, although I believe it to be entirely satisfactory.

8. "Besides the compressed-air method, are there other satisfactory, reliable, and feasible methods (such as the freezing method, the dredging through wells method, or other methods) for the construction of such core wall?"

I have no doubt that either the freezing method or the method of dredging through wells could be successfully applied.

9. "In respect to the effect of earthquakes upon any canal, which structure is the safer one for a dam, viz, a dam constructed entirely of concrete masonry or a dam constructed of earth?"

An earth dam would undoubtedly be subjected to less danger from an earthquake than a masonry dam.

10. "In view of the recent volcanic disturbances in the West Indies, do you consider that there is danger from volcanic action to the canal by the Panama or Nicaragua routes? If so, please state your views thereon."

I consider the danger from the direct action of volcanoes extremely remote, so remote that it is to be considered only if necessary to decide between two lines of which all other conditions are exactly equal.

There can be no question in the mind of anyone, I think, that the danger from earthquakes is far greater than that from volcanic overflow. The Commission concluded that the danger from the former was not great enough to prevent the building of the canal. Having satisfied their minds upon that point, they felt it unnecessary to discuss the minor danger in their report. If they could have anticipated that the public mind would be excited upon the subject, as it has been by the recent occurrences in the West Indies, they would no doubt have said something about it.

There is no volcano within 175 miles of the Panama line, and accordingly there is no danger of direct volcanic overflow for that line.

The volcanoes nearest the Nicaragua line are Ometepe and Madera, the former active and the latter supposed to be extinct, which rise out of Lake Nicaragua, the former about 11 miles and the latter about 6 miles from the direct sailing line laid down in the lake for vessels using the canal. The depth of water on the sailing line varies from 40 to over 100 feet, and between Madera and the sailing line there is a depth of 200 feet. The shortest distance from either volcano to the canal proper is over 13 miles. The sailing line can be altered so that by a slight detour 40 feet depth can be carried past these volcanoes, coming nowhere nearer than 13 miles.

Now, he would be a rash man who would say that there can never be an eruption which will fill all this up. All I have to say is that, personally, I believe there is no more danger of that than there is of a volcanic convulsion which will split the Isthmus across from sea to sea and save us the trouble of building the canal at all. I am not prepared to say that that will never happen, but I should not hesitate to build in anticipation of the one more than of the other. What has happened in Martinique, if it had happened at Ometepe or Madera, would have destroyed the canal.

As I read the newspaper accounts, it would have diminished some of the surplus depth in the lake, and perhaps some of the ashes might have been carried as far as the canal itself in quantity sufficient to reduce the depth of that a foot or two, but no more. Business would no doubt have been frightened away temporarily, but the canal itself would have remained essentially intact. If the Nicaragua line were superior to the Panama line in other respects, I should not leave it on account of volcanoes.

11. "By the plans adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission and recommended to Congress, is the Chagres River absolutely and safely regulated and controlled?"

It is, absolutely. The topography of the country lends itself to a very beautiful solution of that problem. The control is complete, and, what is better, it is automatic.

12. "Are there any engineering features of the Panama route which are not feasible or practicable, or concerning which there is any serious question?"

There are none whatever.

Trusting that these answers are sufficiently full to answer your purpose, I remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

O. H. ERNST,
Lieutenant-Colonel, Corps of Engineers, U. S. A.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 12, 1902.

Hon. M. A. HANNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In replying to your letter of June 11, 1902, addressed to me as a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission, permit me to make the following answers to the various inquiries contained in your letter, each answer corresponding in number to that of each question.

Reply to question 1. My decision was not reached for the sole reason that the cost of purchasing and completing the Panama Canal was estimated to be less than the cost of constructing the Nicaragua Canal, although that difference in favor of the Panama route was an element in my decision.

Reply to question 2. My decision was largely, if not chiefly, affected by the substantial preponderance of the physical engineering advantages of the Panama route over that in Nicaragua, as set forth in the two reports of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Reply to question 3. It is entirely practicable to make the canal on the Panama route a sea-level canal.

Reply to question 4. It is also my judgment that it is practicable and feasible to make the canal on the Panama route a sea-level canal at any time in the future, if it is constructed at first as a lock canal. This can be done by any one of several plans, one of which at least would involve certain adaptations of the plan for a lock canal to the ultimate change to a sea-level canal. Another plan would not require that adaptation. The first of the preceding plans of procedure would involve an increased first cost of the lock canal with less expenditure in the ultimate change to a sea-level canal, while the second plan of procedure would not necessarily involve any increase in the first cost of the lock canal, but a greater final cost in changing to the sea-level canal.

Reply to question 5. It is not practicable to make the Nicaragua Canal a sea-level canal, in consequence of its great length involving enormous cost and a great period of time to construct it on that plan.

Reply to question 6. It is entirely feasible and practicable to construct the Bohio dam under the plans submitted by the Isthmian Canal Commission to Congress without resorting to any untried method or any means not regularly employed in engineering operations at the present day. This statement is based upon my own practical experience in foundation and other subaqueous construction by the use of methods and means contemplated under the plans of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Reply to question 7. The compressed-air method is not the only satisfactory, feasible, and reliable method of constructing the core wall.

Reply to question 8. There are a number of methods besides that of compressed air by which the core wall can be put in place as indicated by the plans of the Commission in a satisfactory manner, one well-known method being that of dredging through open wells, or, as it is sometimes called, the open-dredging method. The freezing method can also be employed. There are at least two or three practicable and satisfactory methods besides that of compressed air, although it is my judgment that the latter method, properly adapted to the situation at Bohio, is preferable; it can be so used as to keep the pressure of the compressed air materially below pressures heretofore used in that class of work.

Reply to question 9. It is my judgment that on neither route is there sensible danger of injury by earthquakes to such a substantial engineering work as a great dam, but I consider a dam constructed of earth as less liable to injury than a dam constructed entirely of concrete masonry.

Reply to question 10. Inasmuch as there is no volcano either on the Panama route, or within 175 miles of it, there can be no danger to canal structures on that line from volcanic action. On the other hand, there are a considerable number of live volcanoes in Nicaragua and Costa Rica, one of which, Ometepe, is within about 10 miles of the Nicaragua route. It may be an open question how much damage would be done to the Nicaragua Canal if Ometepe should be subject to as violent eruption as that which has recently taken place at Mont Pelee, on the island of Martinique, but that danger would exist is beyond question. I do not believe that even such danger would be sufficient either to prevent the construction of the Nicaragua Canal or to necessitate any material change of course involving great cost if no other route were available; but considering this feature of the case only, the Panama route possesses the substantial advantage of being free from all danger of volcanic action.

Reply to question 11. The plans adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission, and recommended in its reports, insure absolutely the certain and safe control and regulation of the Chagres River in all its stages, whether in the highest floods or in the driest seasons. This is accomplished by measures so simple that they can not possibly fail or be deranged.

Reply to question 12. As indicated in full detail in the reports of the Isthmian Canal Commission, there are no engineering features whatever of the Panama route which are not entirely feasible or practicable, or about which there is any serious question as to their practicability or feasibility.

Very respectfully,

WM. H. BURR,
Member of Isthmian Canal Commission.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Baltimore, Md., June 13, 1902

Hon. M. A. HANNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, and hasten to reply to the several questions propounded therein.

First. My decision in determining that the Panama route for the isthmian canal was the best one that could be adopted was not alone because the cost of purchasing and completing the Panama Canal is less than that of constructing the Nicaragua Canal.

Second. The considerations that determined my decision in favor of the Panama route are:

(a) Shorter length of canal.
(b) Fewer and less difficult obstacles to be overcome.
(c) A more thorough knowledge of the physical difficulties.

(d) The less total amount of curvature.
(e) The more moderate degree of curvature—that is, the greater proportionate length of canal that approaches a straight line.
(f) The lower summit level. It will be necessary on the Nicaragua route to raise and lower ships through a vertical height of 104 feet, while at Panama the lift is only 82 feet, an advantage of 22 feet in favor of Panama. Moreover, the height could be still further reduced at Panama, but it can not be reduced at Nicaragua.
(g) The greater ease with which the level of Lake Bohio can be regulated as compared with Lake Nicaragua. The level of Lake Bohio is regulated automatically, and water taken from it for regulation is taken at a distance from the sailing line, whereas in Nicaragua the regulation is necessarily effected by a system of sluices worked by man, and the water, instead of being taken from the lake direct, is taken through a long stretch of river which is used by navigation. This will produce currents in some of the bends which navigators would prefer to avoid.
(h) The largely diminished cost of maintenance.
(i) The belief that if the United States builds a canal at Panama a canal in competition will never be built anywhere else.
(j) Because the actual time of transit will be less.
(k) Because the dangers of temporary obstruction are less in proportion to the length of the canal.
(l) Because a railroad is already constructed and fully equipped.
Third. It is practicable to make the Panama canal a sea level canal.
Fourth. This can be done after construction as a lock canal, but, in my opinion, it never will be because the disadvantage of locks is not sufficient to pay the cost of dispensing with them.
Fifth. It is not practicable to construct a sea-level canal in Nicaragua.
Sixth. The Bohio dam, in my opinion, is entirely feasible and practicable of construction under the plans submitted by the Isthmian Canal Commission to Congress. I believe, however, that a less expensive dam is also feasible and practicable.
Seventh. The compressed-air method of sinking caissons is not the only satisfactory, feasible, and reliable method of constructing the core wall of the dam proposed by the Isthmian Canal Commission.
Eighth. Besides the compressed-air method there are other satisfactory, reliable, and feasible methods for the construction of such core walls.
Ninth. In respect to the effect of earthquakes upon a dam, my opinion is that a dam constructed of earth is safer than one constructed entirely of masonry.
Tenth. In view of the recent volcanic disturbances in the West Indies, the dangers to a canal from volcanic action are greater on the Nicaragua route than on the Panama route.
Eleventh. Under the plans adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission the Chagres River is, in my opinion, safely controlled, though I prefer to reduce the effects of freshets by the construction of a dam at Alajuela, thus creating a basin above it into which nearly 50 per cent of the rainfall can be impounded. This will render the control of the Chagres more satisfactory, and there will be no sediment deposited in Lake Bohio from that stream.
Twelfth. There are no engineering features on the Panama route which it is not feasible or practicable to overcome, or about which there is any serious question.

Yours, truly, PETER C. HAINS,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers, U. S. A.,
Member Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I was interested in some of the statements made before our committee on this subject which have not been referred to. Mr. Plume, one of the witnesses, was asked if he would give us some information concerning the hygiene of the people who worked with him. This question was asked:

The CHAIRMAN. How many hands did you have under you as a rule—about an average?
Mr. PLUME. I had 10 to every section, and a section runs 4 to 5 miles.
The CHAIRMAN. About how many people did the Canal Company have there while you stayed there?
Mr. PLUME. Well, it was estimated that they had 10,000, but I doubt very much if 5,000 were working. The labor is of such a class that it is utterly impossible to get them to work; it is this lazy, good-for-nothing Jamaica labor, and the climate there is so bad that a man can not work.
The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, I want to get at that, and I want you now to be careful in your statements about that. Did you have any trouble in preserving the health of the party under your control—these ten men to a section?
Mr. PLUME. Oh, a great deal, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. What was the average amount of loss per annum, say, during the five or six years you were there, out of your own party, now?
Mr. PLUME. Well, every month or two I would lose a man, perhaps two men. I will explain it to you. If a man gets wet there with the rain he is sure to be sick the next morning. The dew commences to fall at 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon, and if a man gets his clothes wet with this dew and he goes to bed with his clothes on, as sure as he is born he will wake up sick the next morning. I never saw such a climate in all my life, and I have worked in the rice fields of South Carolina, and gracious only knows that is bad enough.
The CHAIRMAN. Can you give the committee some idea of the condition of health of these canal laborers during the time you were in this Isthmus?
Mr. PLUME. When I went there we used to run one train—perhaps it would be a car or two box cars—in the morning out of Colon up to Monkey Hill. Our graveyard is about 5 miles from Colon, on a hill called Monkey Hill, but I had not been there a year when we were up there. Over to Panama it was the same way—bury, bury, bury, running two, three, and four trains a day with dead Jamaica niggers all the time. I never saw anything like it. It did not make any difference whether they were black or white, to see the way they died there. They die like animals.
The CHAIRMAN. Of what disease would they die, if you know anything about it?
Mr. PLUME. There are four most deadly fevers. There is the yellow fever, the pernicious fever, the putrid fever, and the typhoid fever, and the intermittent fever. If the intermittent runs long enough it will turn into typhoid or those other bad fevers. A man will only last three or four days, unless they have pretty quick and pretty severe treatment.
The CHAIRMAN. Did the Panama Canal Company have good shelter for its hands and good hospitals?
Mr. PLUME. Yes; there is no finer hospital on the globe than the one they have at Panama. It is on the side of the Ancon Mountain, which used to be a volcano several centuries ago, and the lava from the volcano went across Panama and out into the bay about a mile. The hospital is a splendid thing. It is said to have cost $5,000,000, and I guess it did. Down in this valley you dig a hole about 2 feet deep and you come to a boiling spring, right under the mountains, and they have engines there pumping water up to this hospital. There is a man in Panama who has a concession to bury people. He opened a graveyard, I suppose 300 feet one way and 400 the other. Every grave is numbered, that they may know who is buried there. In exactly one year after he opened it I drove by there, and there were 1,875 crosses in that burying ground, and that does not count the men that were in the ovens.

It seems they built something which they called ovens, in which they buried the dead, and these ovens were then sealed up.
This witness further said:

Mr. PLUME. That was in the early part of 1887. De Lesseps brought out 57 men there for engineers, chiefs of sections, and for different purposes, clerks. In three months, sir, there were only three of them left. I never saw anything like it in my life. If a man drinks there, he is just as sure to die as he is alive; it is fatal; and here is something very wonderful: I have always noticed if a Frenchman gets one of those fevers he is just as sure to die as he has a hair in his head.

Further on the witness said:

Let me tell you another thing: In 1886 the Panama Canal Company had a meeting. They divided up the Panama Canal into four sections, and they gave three sections out to French contractors, and one section included in the Culebra Cut they gave to a Holland contracting company; a very wealthy company. They came out there and they looked around and fussed about, and they were not there three months before the whole of them left and went back to Holland.

This gentleman further said:

I have no interest in this thing, sir; but I tell you candidly I don't want to see our Government swindled in this operation. I have no choice of route at all, but I do not want to see our Government swindled in or saddled with a thing I know is worthless, and I do not think it is anything but a swindle.

That is all I care to trouble the Senate with, to show that there exists at Panama a most deadly disease, of general prevalence, and that people living in that region are liable to attacks of the worst kind of maladies.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I desire to make some remarks upon the pending bill. I have listened attentively to the debate when I have been present, and I have read some of the arguments which were made in my absence. This is a subject in which I have been very much interested since I first came to this body. I was interested because one of our first statesmen had been then at work on it for about twenty years, and he had so affected the minds of the people of the State where I live that we all, before I ever came here, were deeply interested in the grand fight that he was making for a canal across the Isthmus for our ships. We were interested in him to the last degree and we were interested in the project, not only on account of the reasons which he had advanced to show that this canal was for the common good of all the people of the United States, and absolutely necessary for the common defense of all the people of the United States, but we got down to the lower level, and we were very much interested in the grand project he was advocating because we saw in it incalculable benefits to our own people.

It is evident that the people of the United States generally want and intend to have a ship canal across the Isthmus, built, owned, and controlled exclusively by the United States. They want no partnership either in the ownership or the government of the canal. They want it in the first place as their own, as a naval necessity, for their own protection against foreign aggression on the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific Ocean. They need it for their protection and they need it as an economical measure, to save themselves the expense of maintaining two navies—one in the Atlantic and one in the Pacific.

The marvelous trip of the Oregon from San Francisco around the continent of South America to Santiago demonstrated our need of the canal, and the people of the United States have plainly shown their determination to build, own, and govern a canal across the Isthmus for the benefit of their commerce, coastwise and foreign. And in this commercial use of the canal they are not only willing, but it is their desire, as they have manifested, to have all the world participate equally with the citizens of the United States in the use of the canal.

All political parties in all sections of the United States have manifested the determination of the people of this country to build, own, and govern this canal for the purposes I have stated; and it is my earnest belief that no party or public man can disregard this demand of the people without experiencing the speedy manifestation of the disapproval of the masses of our people.

Look at the symptoms. All over the United States the public press, which voice public sentiment, with a marvelous unanimity declare in favor of a ship canal across the Isthmus, and daily demonstrate the necessity therefor.

For more than six years Presidents of the United States have been all the while publicly known to favor this great enterprise. And what President could there be, not looking, like Alexander, for the creation of other worlds to conquer, would want a monument grander or more enduring than to have this great work erected to his memory under his Administration? Scientists would have to invent some material more enduring than metal or marble if they would have it outlive such a monument as this.

The Senate of the United States, by a majority of 17 (if I remember the vote correctly), declared in favor of this marriage of the two oceans for protection and for commerce. The House of Representatives of the United States, by a majority of 190, at the present session, gave judgment in favor of the will of the people when they voted on the Hepburn bill. State legislatures have declared in favor of an isthmian canal, and many of them in favor of the Nicaragua Canal. The party platforms have declared in favor of the Nicaragua Canal. Can any Senator tell me in what other manner the sovereign will of the people could be more clearly demonstrated? Every Senator who has spoken on this bill has in substance declared his individual opinion in favor of an isthmian canal for national protection and for domestic and foreign commerce.

SURVEYS.

For years past the Congress has ordered surveys to be made of different routes for a canal across the Isthmus, and the Presidents have caused these orders to be executed; and reports on reports have been made by different commissions of surveys of different routes and of different surveys of the same route. Millions of dollars have been thus expended gathering information on which to construct a canal across the Isthmus. I will mention something of these surveys more particularly hereafter.

OPPOSITION.

I have stated and proved that the people of the United States want and are determined to have a canal connecting the two oceans; but when I speak of "the people" in that broad sense I mean the masses of the people. But I could not truthfully include in this declaration all of the people of the United States, because no man can shut his eyes to the fact that there is a set of men in the United States, owning or controlling vast sums of money of which neither Crœsus nor Solomon ever dreamed, who are opposed to any canal of any kind connecting the two oceans, because, as they believe, such a canal would diminish their vast incomes, present and prospective. These financiers, as they are called, shouted loudest for progress, commerce, and the development of our resources when the Atlantic and Pacific were to be united and brought close together by iron rails, governed and controlled by them and for their personal benefit. To this enterprise the United States loaned its credit most lavishly, and the financiers sang, "Hallelujah!"

Some of this money has been returned to the Treasury of the United States, but not all; a part is still unpaid and probably will remain unpaid forever. We are not grieving over what has been lost, for the United States, though millions of its money and millions of its acres of land went into the coffers of these great financiers, have received wonderful benefits from these iron rails across the continent, in the development of the western portion of our country. We do not even grieve that great fortunes have been made by these wise financiers out of the land and capital furnished by our Government.

But when we study the signs of the times and the conduct of these great men of money in their opposition to other great improvements made necessary for our protection, to guard our coast and to facilitate and extend our commerce, we are tempted to doubt the wisdom of our Government in constructing a macadamized road out of the Treasury of the United States into the coffers of the few. If it had been possible, the wisdom of Congress ought to have devised a plan by which these vast fortunes would have gone to enrich more men of more liberal views as to other vast enterprises devised for the safety and benefit of other citizens of the United States and for making permanent the power of the United States itself.

Jacob wants Esau's heritage, but he is not willing to pay even a mess of pottage for it!

CHANGES.

There is another view of this subject in no wise agreeable to an American patriot if he has been a close observer of the movements of great men in the United States in connection with this vast enterprise. Different commissions, as we have stated, have made different surveys for the construction of this canal, and many reports of such surveys have been made. All of said reports, with one exception, declare in favor of the route across Nicaragua and Costa Rica, varying in special lines of that route. It did seem from these reports that the Government had all the information needed from which to make its selection of a line on which to construct a canal.

The President and the Congress were informed that the line through Nicaragua Lake was safe and practicable for the construction of a permanent canal; that the country through which the line passed was a healthy country, capable of great agricultural development, and that there was no obstacle or difficulty on the line to the construction of a permanent canal which could not be easily overcome by means and methods known to skillful engineers and already practiced by them in other great enterprises of that kind; that there was no part of this line on which engineers had to try some new experiment.

I am not stating the words of the reports, but merely the substance. If the practicability of constructing a permanent ship canal connecting the two oceans by the Nicaragua route could possibly be proved by the surveys and declarations of skillful engineers, it was proved by these reports. Since these surveys were made and these reports made, not only by commissions appointed by the Government, but by other great engineers, no survey whatever has been made of the Nicaragua route so far as we have been informed, but since the last survey of the Walker Commission was made and since that survey was reported to the Congress, a marvelous change has taken place.

It has been claimed in this debate many times that we should act on the advice and findings of the engineers, who are experts, learned on canals and waterways; and on that just proposition the deduction is that, as the last words of the Commission last appointed favor the Panama route, we should adopt that line. This deduction is not just or reasonable, in these:

First. It ignores all that this identical Commission declared in their former reports.

Second. It ignores as of no force all things declared as facts and as opinions in the reports of former official Commissions.

Third. And it ignores and rejects as of no value the surveys and opinions of many of our greatest engineers—Childs, Lull, Menocal, Cooley, Charles T. Harvey, and others.

Certainly we should rely on and act on the facts and on the opinions stated by experts. And if we do so, no one can doubt what our choice should be. Three separate Commissions have declared in favor of the Nicaragua Canal. The last changed its opinion, after its last survey had been made and reported, on a mere proposition from a discredited, if not insolvent, corporation to sell what remains of the Panama Canal to the United States for $40,000,000, which does not include vast sums to be paid to the so-called Republic of Colombia, the amounts to be hereafter ascertained by negotiation and treaty with Colombia.

We were told a few moments ago about the great value of the inventoried property and a book containing the inventory was exhibited. The vast value of that inventoried property was spread out before us as an inducement to go to Panama. Now, let me read what these same individuals, who now want to buy all of that personal property, said about it in their official report.

Mr. MORGAN. From what page does the Senator read?

Mr. PETTUS. I read from the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, 1899–1901, page 102.

As a general rule, this property shows signs of attention—

Speaking now of the personal property of the Panama Canal Company as they found it—

As a general rule, this property shows signs of attention, and the evidence seems satisfactory that it has been well cared for since the liquidator took charge of it in 1889. It would manifestly be imprudent, however, to fix a value upon any important machine which has been idle that length of time without first actually testing it at work, however neatly painted and sheltered it may now be. Much of the property is ill adapted to American methods, and all of it is now from thirteen to twenty years old, during which period the improvements in this class of machinery have been such that contractors would generally find it to their advantage to buy entirely new machinery of modern pattern rather than attempt to use this of an older class, even if given to them free and in good order.

The locomotives, rails, and cars may be of some service, but their value is doubtful; the locomotives are much lighter than is desirable for economical service; the rails are of a pattern ill fitted to rough use, and the cars have narrow-tread wheels. The cars are probably the best part of the whole outfit. It has seemed to the Commission that in acquiring the Panama Canal the United States should not buy this plant as a whole, and that no special allowance should be made for it in estimating the total value of the property. Its owners may realize something by the sale of portions of it to contractors if the latter find that they can use it to advantage. This valuation is all that the Commission can put upon the plant; it has already appeared in the estimates, since the unit prices have been fixed upon the condition that contractors furnish their own plant.

That much for this parade of an inventory and its great value. It is true, and ought in fairness to be stated, that the Commission do state that the railroad itself is a very valuable property.

I go back now to the experts. But if the Senate should decide this question alone on the opinions of the members of the last Walker commission, without any reference to other history, and without any reference to the opinions of other great engineers, we would be forced to decide it in favor of the Nicaragua route, because all of the members of the last Walker commission reported in favor of the Nicaragua route, and gave most cogent and satisfactory reasons why that route should be adopted.

True it is that afterwards the same Commission reported in favor of the Panama route, but the only reason on which this last preference is based is the difference in the cost of the two routes, estimated by them to be less than six millions in favor of the Panama route. They do not pretend even in that report that the Panama is the safer route. There was no such thing in their report until the Senator from Ohio put in what he called their statement this evening.

But since these contradictory reports were both made by the last Walker Commission, members of that Commission were examined on oath before the Senate committee in charge of this bill, and they testified on oath, separately, each for himself, and from their testimony it is shown in substance that they had not changed their opinion as to the safety, practicability, or endurance of a canal on the Nicaragua route, or any of the facts stated by them in their report, before the Panama Canal Company made their proposition to sell to the United States. Nor do said commissioners in their testimony before the Senate committee make any substantial change in their statements and opinions in reference to the Panama route, as stated in their report made last fall, before they heard of the proposition to sell the Panama Canal to the United States.

Taken as a whole—I speak of all these reports from one end to the other and the testimony before the committee—all the reports of every sort, including the testimony made by the last Walker Commissioners, prove—

First. That the Panama line passes through an extremely sickly country, but the Nicaragua line passes through a country remarkably healthy for the latitude.

Second. That the distance from our Atlantic to our Pacific coasts by the Nicaragua route is about 500 miles nearer than by the Panama route.

Third. That all the work on the Nicaragua route can certainly be constructed and maintained permanently by skillful engineers by means and modes already well known and heretofore practiced by engineers in enterprises of like character, but that on the Panama route the dam at Bohio, upon which the entire safety and efficiency of the canal depends, involves new and untried problems in engineering.

All these engineers say that a double lift of 45 feet has never been attempted by any engineer on earth. There is a 90-foot raise at one place. As I understand it, this double lift consists of two connected locks. One raises the vessel to the distance of 45 feet and puts it into another, and the other raises it 45 feet—in other words, it raises it 90 feet at the same place—and all the engineers state in these reports that no such thing has ever been done by any engineer on earth. Why, then, is it not an untried problem? It is stated in the very words that it is an untried problem.

Fourth. That on the Nicaragua route there are several safe places on which to construct the principal dam, but on the Panama route there is but one place, Bohio, on which to construct the dam on which the safety of the canal depends, and that involves new and untried problems which engineers have not as yet solved.

Fifth. That the Panama route is within the zone of calms or doldrums, and that it is very difficult for sailing vessels to get into or out of the bay of Panama or Colon at either end of the Panama Canal; whereas the Nicaragua route, including Lake Nicaragua, lies directly within the line of the trade winds, and that this condition on the Nicaragua line is most advantageous for sailing vessels.

Just there, do Senators want to have a canal built only for steamers? Do not Senators know that over 60 per cent of the present commerce of the United States is carried in sailers? I am speaking of vessels of the United States. Over 60 per cent of them are sailing ships, and in some of the other nations the per cent of their sailing vessels is still over 70 per cent.

The Commission of which Rear-Admiral John G. Walker was president has proved these five propositions beyond all doubt, without any reference to the surveys and opinions of other great engineers well acquainted with the two lines. In the report which was completed May 9, 1899, and sent to the President, the Commissioners say, in substance, that they were closely engaged in the work for a period of one year and nine months, and that they spent five days at Panama "in examining the Panama Canal line, the work being done, and the plans, drawings, and data in the office of the company at Panama." And after stating in detail the work that they had done and the particular questions they had decided, they conclude as follows:

> The Commission, after mature deliberation, has adopted and estimated for the route from Brito to Lake Nicaragua, called the Childs route, varient No. 1, and from the lake to Greytown, that is called the Lull route, varient No. 1. This line, leaving Brito, follows the left bank of the Rio Grande to near Buen Retiro, crosses the western divide to the valley of the Lajas, which it follows to Lake Nicaragua. Crossing the lake to the head of the San Juan River, it follows the upper river to near Boca San Carlos, thence, in excavation, by the left bank of the river to the San Juanillo, and across the low country to Greytown, passing to the northward of Lake Silico. It requires but a single dam with regulating works at both ends of the summit level.

Mr. President, I have mentioned what these particular engineers have said partially about these two routes. I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that if the Panama route was as feasible and as easy and as little expensive as its advocates would have us believe, it is absolutely impracticable on account of the health of the place. Senators talk about remedying the health of a place. You can not do it. Nature fixes it so that it can not be done inside of a cost. You would have to build a wall strong enough to keep the ocean in place before you could ever use such a canal as that for the safe or reasonable benefit of the people.

What is it? Look at the history of the place. A distinguished physician, Mr. Nelson, an Englishman living in Canada, spent five years in Panama, and he gives the most gloomy account possible. I will not read it, but I will state its conclusion. He says the healthy season in Panama is from December to April and the sickly season is from April to December, but that Panama in the healthy season is the sickliest place on earth. Now, that is his judgment of it, and he proves it mathematically by his statement.

These Commissioners speak of it as an unhealthy place. That is one of the objections to it, but it is the mildest form of a statement that they make. My venerable friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] spoke of his personal experience at that place. I had some experience there myself. I went through that place as rapidly as a mule could carry me, but I did not go through fast enough to escape the Panama fever, which clung to me like a dead weight for months.

Mr. President, the health of that place was not exaggerated by this Canadian doctor, who lived there in it for five years by methods that he seemed to have learned how to take care of himself at times, though he suffered severely himself. The yellow fever is not always what is called epidemic in Panama, but it is always there. There is not a day in the year that they do not have it. The Panama fever is slower, but almost a sure death. All the malignant types of fever that are ever mentioned are prevalent in that place. Gain and commerce will carry some people there; and they live afterwards—sometimes.

Mr. President, there is a cause there that a man who has no knowledge of medicine, no acquaintance with the sciences of disease can see with his naked eye and know to be the cause. The ordinary tides in the Panama Bay are from 16 to 20 feet. They frequently go up as high as 24 feet. Think of a tide going into a bay with a 16-foot lift. If it ran up against a stone wall it would not do any harm. But that is a very large bay. I do not remember the exact dimensions, but it is over 100 miles around by a good deal.

Mr. MORGAN. It is 100 miles by 60.

Mr. PETTUS. All around that bay from one land point to another land point there is a sand beach about 2 miles wide. When the tide comes in that sand beach is covered all over it and all around the harbor, and the tide throws on the sand beach accumulations from the sea. Seaweed and everything noxious that happens to be in the bay or about it the tide throws up there. The climate is always away up into 80° or 90° and it is always so moist that it can almost saturate a piece of paper that you would lay out in the sun. It is a wet climate; it is a hot climate. All the filth that is thrown on this wide beach lies absolutely exposed to the sun and to this wet atmosphere for twelve hours every day, and it boils this festering stuff and throws it all over the country.

Mr. President, that very thing can not be exaggerated. It is so bad that the United States ought not to invite the world to such a pesthouse. If you examine anybody who has been there and looked at it, who has just seen the bay itself, he would know what was the cause.

Now, how are you going to drain that bay? How are you going to arrange for the clearing of these 2 miles of beach that is covered every day by a 16 to 20 foot tide?

It is true that on the other side the tide is entirely of a different sort. Just think of it! Senators talk about cleaning out and improving the harbor down here at Cuba. To be sure, that can be done. Why? Mr. President, the tide there is hardly ever as much as 3 feet and 9 inches or 10 inches. There is nothing there that you can not protect. If you clean out the bay you have got it cleansed, and I suppose American energy could do that. I have no doubt it would do it. But such a thing as I have described can not be remedied by anything that any legislative body has ever yet prescribed. How are you going to clean such a thing as I have described and keep it clean? It can not be done. These physicians say the beach is the grand cause of the desolation of death which prevails there. To be sure, there are other causes, and very severe ones, but this is the grand cause and the cause under which millions of men have died and have been buried there.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one other item about this Panama and Colombia. It is the Republic of Colombia that owns the country we are talking about. That is the name of it, but it is the most peculiar republic in one respect of which I have information. It is a republic without one grain of religious liberty. It is a mongrel population of a most peculiar kind. So far as I have seen or heard the negro is the best part of the population there, with a very few exceptions. I am sorry to say that in my researches about this matter I have come across a very disagreeable fact. We read Washington's Farewell Address. I heard the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] read it here one day. It was a little inopportune, but he emphasized the words warning us against entangling alliances. Yet if you look into our treaty you will find that we are tied up with this Government of Colombia in the way of guaranteeing their sovereignty. The United States has bargained to do it. I was very sorry to read it.

That country also made a treaty with the Pope, and I will just get the Secretary, if the President please and the Senate consent, to read a short extract from the treaty made with the Pope, and also another item added there, one page of the laws passed by the Colombian Congress to carry out the treaty that they had made, called a concordat, with the Pope. Senators can see what liberty those people have and what class of people in a republic could ever have made such a concordat or enacted laws to enforce it. When you look at the people, Mr. President, you will understand it. The Secretary will please read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

CONCORDAT ENTERED INTO BETWEEN POPE LEO XII AND THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA, RATIFIED 1888.

[Extract.]

ART. 12. Public education and instruction in universities, colleges, schools, and in other centers of instruction shall be organized and directed in conformity with the dogmas and moral teachings of the Catholic Church.

ART. 13. Consequently, in such centers of instruction the respective diocesan bishops, either by themselves or by special delegation, shall exercise the right in whatever concerns religion and morals and inspect and revise the text-books in use in the same.

The Archbishop of Bogota shall prescribe the text-books relating to religion and morals to be used in the universities, and to insure uniformity of teaching on those subjects, said prelate, in connection with other bishops, shall choose the text-books for the other schools of official instruction.

The Government shall see that no lectures are delivered on literary, scientific, or general subjects in any branch of learning that inculcate ideas contrary to Catholic dogmas or calculated to lessen the respect due to the church.

ART. 14. If, in spite of the orders and precautions of the Government, the moral and religious teaching (in universities, colleges, etc.) shall not conform to the Catholic doctrines, the respective diocesan may withdraw from the offending professors and masters the privilege of teaching any such branches.

A part of the laws passed by Colombia to enforce the concordat are as follows:

"ART. 34. Marriage contracted according to the rites of the Catholic religion of itself annuls (ipso jure) a purely civil marriage previously celebrated by the contractants with other persons.

"ART. 35. For the purely civil effect of the law it acknowledges the legitimacy of children conceived prior to the annulment of a civil marriage by virtue of the provision of the preceding article.

"ART. 36. The man who, having married civilly, marries subsequently with another woman according to the rights of the Catholic religion is obliged to provide maintenance for the first wife and for the children had by her so long as she does not marry according to the Catholic rite."

Mr. PETTUS. Now, Mr. President, that is a picture of the sort of people you are going to have to surround you at Panama and in that Republic of Colombia. They are a Republic, and insist on it that they are a free Republic, and yet no privilege of religious worship is given. There is no privilege of teaching. There is an established faith, and the faith must be conformed to in all the schools. The faith must be upheld. If a man happens to be married according to the rules prescribed by the legislature and to change his mind and is then married the next day or in the next ten years to another woman according to the forms prescribed by the Catholic Church, that operates ipso facto as a divorce. They required him, however, to maintain the children by the first marriage.

Mr. President, I am not speaking of these things to censure the Catholic Church. I have none of the prejudice against that church that we sometimes see exhibited, but I say here, as a Protestant, that no church on earth should ever be allowed to control the liberty of the citizen. Many of the churches have tried it; not the Catholic Church alone. But no church with the civil power has ever allowed any religious liberty. "Oh," my Baptist friends may say, "we never oppressed anybody." And they did not for the best reason in the world—they never had a chance. [Laughter.] But I would not like to hear my Episcopalian friends or my Presbyterian friends say anything about how clean their churches are from all oppression. If you go and look at history on that subject as it is written, you will find that in Scotland as well as in Spain, and in England as well as in other countries, the church that had the civil power crushed out all religious liberty. That being the history of the world, Mr. President, I do not think we ought ever to trust any of the civil power to the church.

I look with the utmost veneration on the man who is trying to obey his Master's will; I say "trying," because the Master says no man does it fully. I look with the utmost veneration upon such a man; but when a man tells me that I have not the right to worship my Master in the form I choose and in the church to which I desire to belong, I do not appeal to the Constitution of the United States, but I appeal to the innate rights of man that no human power can justly or lawfully take away—the law of God itself.

I have been led into this digression on this subject. I only brought this in to illustrate what kind of people we should have to deal with at Panama. Well, next door neighbor to them there is a worse people—the Panama Canal Company. If there is any word which is innocent in itself that indicates the perfection of scientific fraud, that word is "Panama"—the Panama Canal Company—and I have got a sentiment that I do not want the name of the United States connected with that infamy.

Mr. President, I want to call to the attention of the Senate the words of some other great engineers in reference to these two canals. This canal commission was composed in part of great engineers. There were lawyers and sailors and other people upon it; but there were also great engineers upon it. I am not discrediting what they say, but there are other great engineers who have investigated this subject. I want to call attention first to what was said immediately on this subject by one of our great engineers, Lyman E. Cooley. I presume the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Michigan know who Mr. Cooley is. He is represented as a great engineer; he is represented as the engineer who constructed the Chicago Drainage Canal. He is acquainted with these subjects, and is a man of vast reputation. I suppose he heard what was going on here in the Senate. He heard that there were volcanoes all over the Senate in every direction, and he wrote about the volcanoes and other things. I will read what he says:

To the editor of the Herald:

The violent volcanic eruptions in the Windward Islands, with the appalling loss of life, are being used by the Panama advocates and by canal opponents in general as bases for predicting dire disaster to the Nicaragua Canal.

The nearest volcanic cone to the canal line is Ometepe, in Lake Nicaragua and opposite the Pacific division. The crater is some 12 miles from the lake entrance of the canal, with 8 miles of intervening water, and the first lock is about 20 miles away.

I have seen nothing in the dispatches to indicate that a canal similarly located in respect to Mont Pelee would have been destroyed in the present eruption, though damage might have resulted.

The conditions in the valley of Nicaragua are in no sense parallel to the case at Vesuvius or in the Windward Islands. There are no historical records or traditions and no physical evidence to indicate a similar expectation. We know of nothing in the vicinity of either the Nicaragua or the Panama route equal to the Charleston earthquake, and this would not deter the construction of a canal along this portion of the Atlantic coast. There has been nothing to compare with the series of the New Madrid earthquakes, in 1811-1813, in the very heart of the Mississippi Valley.

POSITION OF THE ROUTE.

The Nicaragua depression lies between two centers of volcanic activity long since past. To the east are the Costa Rica highlands, with its volcanic knot, of which Irazu is the only living cone. To the west are the highlands of Jinotepee, on the northern flanks of which occurred the great eruptions which closed out Lake Nicaragua from the sea, and Masaya is the only cone in this group which has shown any activity in the historic period.

There has been only one volcano there which has shown any activity in the historic period.

An earth fracture with a line of vents appears to lead northwesterly from the Costa Rica knot and terminates in Orosi, before reaching Lake Nicaragua. Orosi is supposed to be extinct. A line of vents also extends southwesterly from Masaya and terminates in the Island of Ometepe, with its two cones—Madera and Ometepe, the latter of which is still alive. The canal route lies in the gap between Orosi and Madera, the two peaks which exhibit the limits of past activity.

There is more evidence at Panama, both in regard to the number and the destructive effect of earthquakes. Old Panama was once destroyed. Since the French operations a crevasse was opened across Colon and the cathedral at Panama was damaged.

The Caribbean Sea is bounded on all sides by formations more or less volcanic in character. The Greater Antilles, the Isthmus, and the coasts of the mainland belong to early Tertiary time. The forces are long spent and the land stable during recent geologic time. The formations athwart the Caribbean Sea, and known as the Windward Islands, are comparatively recent, and seismic forces are still active.

The valley of Nicaragua appears to be the most stable bit of land, and to have suffered less change since its formation than any other region between the two main continents, unless it be the Isthmus of Tehuantepec.

That violent seismic disturbances will never occur in Nicaragua can not be predicted. They are possible anywhere on earth. Two destructive earthquakes have occurred in the United States in one century, and apparently remote from volcanic regions. The ruins of Baalbeck were dislocated by an earthquake in modern times—structures built of stone larger than since used and that go back into tradition before the children of Israel entered the "promised land." Do such remote contingencies cut any figure in insurance rates?

COMPARISON OF PROBABILITIES.

The recorded data of a comparatively short period indicate a greater mathematical probability that Kansas City, or even St. Louis, will be wiped out by a tornado than the evidence along the Nicaragua route indicates that the canal will be destroyed by an earthquake. Direct destruction by volcanic eruption is not within the domain of probability. A new fracture in the earth crust must first open, an event as probable as a new rent in a steam boiler while the old fracture still exists.

The vital structures of a canal are in the earth rather than in the air, and are not subject to the destructive whip-lash action in structures rising high from the ground surface. Canal masonry will be monolithic concrete, and can be made much stronger than masonry of stone blocks, and it can be reenforced at vital points to any extent by incorporating metal; in fact, concrete-metal construction is destined to a great future. Girder lock gates, with broad bearings, can be substituted for the ordinary type. High masonry dams and narrow embankments can be avoided. All this will involve some change in conception and treatment from the official plans, but it can be successfully and economically worked out, as I know from my own experience.

There is nothing in the situation which should deter the construction of a proper canal. No experience warrants the assumption that the canal will be injured throughout by any single disturbance, and the probabilities are that any very violent action will be quite local and limited to such damage as can be repaired with an interruption of traffic of a few weeks at most. The presumption that such dangers are imminent is not warranted by any known fact on the Nicaragua route.

The danger from flood is more serious. The unexpected has repeated itself in river valleys more often than destructive earthquakes have repeated themselves in the same locality, even in known earthquake regions, and there have been terrible losses of life and property therefrom, many times that due to all known seismic causes. The great equalizing lake of Nicaragua is an insurance in this regard superior to what can be produced at Panama.

The health problem, as concerns human life, is far more potent than either. Epidemic menace, with its attendant losses, is a higher probability than either earthquake or flood in this respect. Panama may be considered truly and actively volcanic in comparison with Nicaragua.

It is easy to indulge in destructive criticisms, to exaggerate and invent difficulties, and to raise doubts. This is the province of the man who wishes to prevent action and vote no. Human progress is due to the man who meets new conditions with new solutions, who can solve doubts rather than raise them, who can vote an intelligent aye.

LYMAN E. COOLEY.

CHICAGO, ILL., June 4, 1902.

Lyman E. Cooley, the writer of this letter, is a civil engineer of international note, his specialty being waterways and kindred undertakings, to which he has devoted twenty-four years of his engineering life. He has at different times and in different capacities been professionally identified with almost every deep-water enterprise from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean, through the Hudson River, the Erie Canal, the Great Lakes, the Chicago-St. Louis deep waterway, and the Mississippi and Missouri improvements, and with the Nicaragua or Panama Canal. He has the distinction of having walked over the Nicaragua and the Panama Canal routes. As I have already stated, he was once chief engineer and is now consulting engineer of the Chicago Drainage Canal. His engineering experience has covered a wide field, and he is a profound student in his profession.

Mr. President, in this connection I will state that Mr. Childs made a survey of this route. He was a great engineer. Lull followed him and made a survey, and he was a great engineer. They both declared that the Nicaragua route was perfectly practicable.

I will ask the Secretary to read a very interesting letter addressed to my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] by the great engineer Harvey, who constructed the Michigan Canal. It deals with this subject, and there are some parts of it that are bound to sound on the heart of any American patriot.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The national interest evidently lies in shortening the distance to be traversed from one of these coast lines to the other as much as possible, and which the isthmian canal will reduce by over 10,000 miles. The Nicaragua route lies nearest the same by about 500 miles sailing distance, so that a round trip involves a saving of 1,000 miles over the Panama route, which means ninety hours or nearly four days' extra time for the average freight steamers and double that for the average sailing vessels. It has been claimed that this is partly counterbalanced by a shorter time of transit through the Panama Canal, but this may be reasonably doubted.

No account is taken in such comparison of the distance to be traversed in the bay of Panama of 120 miles on the west, or in Colon Bay of about 10 miles on the east, to reach an equal offing from the main coast lines for laying northerly sailing courses. By adding these, the Panama route, east and west is a few miles longer than that of Nicaragua, and by the testimony of Commander Young before your committee it appears that both Panama and Colon bays have tortuous channels which require daylight and freedom from fogs to navigate safely. As the section of minimum canal width is about the same in both routes, and the remainder of the Nicaragua route, having the enlarged areas of Nicaragua Lake, and its artificial elongation, will permit of full speed by steamers, and its additional elevation above sea level to be overcome by lockage being less than 20 feet, the alleged saving of transit time on the Panama route practically disappears, and a parity in that respect can be safely assumed for both.

The geographical position of the Panama route, being in the area or zone of calms or doldrums (as stated by several of the witnesses before your committee), practically lays an effective embargo against sailing craft being benefited by it, while the prevalence of reliable trade winds or air currents on the Nicaragua route offers special advantages to sail propulsion.

These facts are brought out so positively in the documentary evidence published by your committee that I need not enlarge upon them, but when coupled with the statement that of the entire marine tonnage of the United States, aggregating by the latest returns 2,095,000 tons, 1,285,000, or over 60 per cent, is sailing craft, the same becomes most momentous. Norway and Sweden have 1,144,000 tons of sail craft to 626,000 of steam, or over 70 per cent.

To rule out such proportions of the national and world's marine would seem a clearly preposterous proposition. To minimize the effect of these considerations it has been asserted that the use of sail craft is on a decline, which portends the almost universal use of steam marine power. But here again facts are against this theory. Improvements are taking place in the construction of sailing vessels which may place them in the lead as the most economical freighters. The old-style square-rigged ships are being supplanted by multiple-masted schooner-rigged vessels of larger dimensions than ever before employed.

Thus, seven-masted schooners of 3,000 and 4,000 tons burden are being built in the State of Maine shipyards, fitted with auxiliary steam engines, effecting a saving of nearly 75 per cent in the number of requisite sailing crew which a square-rigged ship of the same capacity would require. The sending of sailors aloft to "take in sail" in a gale of wind is nearly obsolete. The sails of a modern sailing vessel are now handled by power winches from the deck—a veritable revolution in marine industry, the far-reaching results of which students of such matters will appreciate as radically important in deciding as to the isthmian canal routes, which in one case prohibits and in the other favors the same.

It is well known that the building of sail craft has taken a new start in Germany, where one of some 5,000 tons burden has recently been added to the merchant marine, and that France is offering a bounty to vessels of that kind. This may be the result of far-seeing statesmanship, in view of the economizing of coal consumption, which is fast becoming one of the great industrial problems of this century.

RISKS AS TO PERMANENCY AND REPAIRS.

Under this caption the most fundamental points of difference between the Panama and Nicaragua routes come under review. In the case of the former the original plans of Count de Lesseps had the merit of minimizing the risks of serious breaks in the canal proper, except such as might arise in the problem of controlling the Chagres River, but the plans of the new company include the creating of a high-level artificial lake of some 43 square miles area by the interposition of a dam 2,546 feet long, 228 feet high above the bed rock, so far as the latter has been found by boring, the whole to be of earth except a narrow masonry core, intended more to prevent seepage than to prevent superlateral resistance to the rear water pressure. Three dangers might each cause the overthrow of this structure: First, percolation under its base; second, the sudden bursting of restraining reservoir dams farther up in the Chagres River valley; third, seismic disturbances in that locality.

The first two may be averted by engineering skill and unlimited expense, but the latter is beyond human prevention, and this, it seems, is a local menace with startling recent proofs of pendency. The report of the Canal Commission, page 168, reads as follows:

For Panama the records show 28 earthquakes. Of these 12 occurred in the three years 1882-1884. During the earthquake of September 7, 1882, a part of the Cathedral at Panama was thrown down, and the headquarters building of the canal company was cracked. The railroad had its tracks and roadbed in places thrown out of line, and the masonry of three or four bridges and culverts were damaged. At Los Cruces the church was thrown down; at Colon some lives were lost and crevasses were opened and the Jamaica telegraph line was broken.

To this Mr. Haupt adds, in his evidence (page 551), that in 1882 Colon was rent with a seam across the town, and the railroad bridge at Barbacoa was shifted out of position.

These points being in the vicinity of the proposed dam the extraordinary risk to its permanency is at once apparent. Should it give away the eastern section of the canal would be obliterated with a roar and a rush awful beyond description. Not a person between it and Colon would probably be left alive to tell the tale, and ships in the canal might be buried out of sight by the débris or hurled as shapeless wrecks into the ocean.

Having been in the vicinity of the Johnstown dam disaster, and having witnessed the devastation caused by the concurrent breaking of a series of reservoir dams in the Lehigh River Valley, where I have seen canal boats carried out of the canal near the river and landed miles away from its line, with the crew drowned in the flood, I have a very acute dread of such catastrophies from actual observation of their effects.

These occurred in the heart of the old State of Pennsylvania, with engineering ability of the highest grade near at hand. How much greater the danger from like causes in the almost unknown recesses of Panama!

I have examined the testimony of Messrs. Haupt and Plume, in their recent evidence, and in view of the facts they state as to the treacherous nature of the main strata in the vicinity to be relied upon for dam foundations and the imperfect result of the examination of the same by the French engineering corps, my conclusion is that the risk incident to that feature of the Panama route is one that the United States can not afford to assume, much less any contracting syndicate or individual; and for myself I would not, under any probable circumstances, be willing to be connected with it professionally or otherwise. The risk is beyond human assurance, and therefore too great. This conclusion renders consideration of various other difficulties inherent to the Panama route superfluous.

In regard to the Nicaragua route, I find no element of extraordinary risk. The dams upon the east and west slopes can be made earthquake proof beyond all question, and permanent for all time. But it is well to note that Professor Haupt states that as the result of exhaustive examinations of data, he finds that the zone in which the Nicaragua route is located is less disturbed by earthquakes than any other section of like extent on the globe. This presents a most radical and favorable contrast to that of its competitor.

In sanitary conditions the contrast is also remarkably favorable to the more northern route, which is alone a feature of prime importance in the case, as risks to life and health control all others from both a phyiscal and financial standpoint. * * *

NATIONAL PRESTIGE.

The completion of the Nicaragua route upon the lines hereinbefore indicated will be the greatest engineering achievement in the records of the world up to this time, and will form one of the epochs of history. Its exploration was first ordered by the Emperor Charles V, in 1516, in a general way, and in 1529 was actually carried out by Capt. Diego Machua, then in his service. From that date to the present the route has been one of the most prominent projects commanding the world's attention.

If the United States commences and completes it in a creditable manner, it will have all the honor which such result implies.

On the other hand, the Panama route was promoted in France some two decades since, and its not only disastrous but scandalous failure resulted in 1889, the details of which are too well known to need special mention in this connection.

By the evidence of Charles Colné, on page 211, it appears that there were 800,000 individuals who were sufferers from the losses entailed by the grand fiasco. Supposing that the United States bought out the assets of the defunct undertaking at the price of forty millions, now proposed in its behalf; all of those 800,000 persons, with hardly an exception, would insist that this nation had taken advantage of them and forced a sharp bargain in the purchase, and might unite to present claims for allowances with the Government of France as a quasi sponsor for the same.

These sentiments would be transmitted from one generation to another, and the prestige of this nation correspondingly impaired.

Again, if the undertaking were carried through to a successful conclusion, prejudiced historians would assert that to M. de Lesseps belonged the éclat of the initiative, and the lines of cleavage between the failure and the success would be debatable for all time.

Under these conditions, it can be reasonably claimed that, even if the Panama route were a desirable acquisition from an engineering standpoint at the purchase price proposed, the fair name and prestige would be injured to an extent and in a manner for which no monetary consideration would prove an adequate equivalent.

As a representative of ancestors who were among the earliest to establish the social and political framework of this country and to defend its liberty and honor with their lives, I must, as a citizen and individual, protest against its sacrifice of the prestige of a glorious achievement presented on the one hand for the debased and discredited remains of a prior failure on the other.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, there is the opinion of a great engineer, and I desire particularly to call attention to one thing which is there established by his testimony. We have been told time and again—it has been repeated over and over to-day—about the delays that would occur on the Nicaragua route by reason of a vessel having to stop in the nighttime. These engineers show that there is no difficulty whatever in using the canal at any hour of the day and night, and they particularly call attention to the fact that there are no fogs in that climate to obscure the light which might be given by electricity along the line of the canal the darkest night. The atmosphere is free from fogs.

Mr. President, I do not want to run this argument into the night. I merely wish to ask Senators to consider this project as having been advocated by the people, advocated by both political parties, passed upon by both Houses of Congress, and passed upon by one of them almost unanimously during the present session, passed upon by all of our States almost—all in favor of this particular Nicaragua route. Now, because we have a flash light from a decayed and fraudulent company, an offer to purchase the old canal at Panama, with all its miserable memories, we are abandoning that which the House has sent to us, the Hepburn bill.

If you do not want to defeat a canal—if that is not any part of the purpose, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] assures us, and we are bound to believe him, that that is no part of the purpose—why not go along with the House with your own record, when you had the same information in every respect that you have now, if you leave out the French bargain which has been offered to you? Not a fact has been changed.

You voted for it in substance by 17 majority. Mr. HEPBURN had it passed and sent over here last session. It is true we did not have time to consider it. We were very busy about more important matters, and we never had time to consider it. It has come across my mind—and I might just as well speak it out now—that there was a purpose to defeat any canal at any time to be built by the United States, because it interfered very materially with other business interests. But, Mr. President, if you do not want to defeat any canal at all, why not go along with the House? I do not personally know Mr. HEPBURN, but I have heard a marvelous account of the nerve he displayed at Stone River and Chickamauga, and I do hope to God that there is a large part of that courage left.

During Mr. PETTUS'S speech,

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator do me the kindness to yield for a single second?

Mr. PETTUS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I of course have the right to perfect the substitute which I have proposed to the bill, and I have drawn some amendments to it. I ask that it be printed with the amendments in italics.

Mr. KEAN. Will the Senator also ask to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SPOONER. Very well; I ask to have it printed in the RECORD in the same way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. SPOONER. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment as modified is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SPOONER to the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, viz: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to acquire, for and on behalf of the United States, at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000, all of the rights, privileges, franchises, concessions, grants of land, right of way, unfinished work, plants, and other property, real, personal, and mixed, of every name and nature, owned by the New Panama Canal Company, of France, on the Isthmus of Panama, and all its maps, plans, drawings, records, on the Isthmus of Panama and in Paris, including all the capital stock, not less, however, than 68,863 shares of the Panama Railroad Company, owned by or held for the use of said canal company, provided a satisfactory title to all of said property can be obtained.

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to acquire from the Republic of Colombia, for and on behalf of the United States, upon such terms as he may deem reasonable, exclusive and perpetual control [in perpetuity] of a strip of land, the territory of the Republic of Colombia, [ten] not less than six miles in width, extending from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, and the right to use and dispose of the waters thereon, and to excavate, construct, and to perpetually maintain, operate, and protect thereon a canal, of such depth and capacity as will afford convenient passage of ships of the greatest tonnage and draft now in use, from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, which control shall include the right to perpetually maintain and operate the Panama Railroad, if the ownership thereof, or a controlling interest therein, shall have been acquired by the United States, and also jurisdiction over said strip and the ports at the ends thereof to make such police and sanitary rules and regulations as shall be necessary to preserve order and preserve the public health thereon, and to establish such judicial tribunals thereon as may be necessary to enforce such rules and regulations.

The President may acquire such additional territory and rights from Colombia as in his judgment will facilitate the general purpose hereof.

SEC. 3. That when the President shall have [obtained] arranged to secure a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company, as provided in section 1 hereof, and [the] shall have obtained by treaty control of the necessary territory from the Republic of Colombia, as provided in section 2 hereof, he is authorized to pay for the property of the New Panama Canal Company $40,000,000 and to the Republic of Colombia such sum as shall have been agreed upon, and a sum sufficient for both said purposes is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid on [a] warrant or warrants drawn by the President.

The President shall then [direct the Secretary of War to] cause to be excavated, constructed, and completed, utilizing to that end as far as practicable the work heretofore done by the New Panama Canal Company, of France, and its predecessor company, a ship canal from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean. Such canal shall be of sufficient capacity and depth as shall afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing through the same from ocean to ocean; and [the Secretary of War] he shall also cause to be constructed such safe and commodious harbors at the termini of said canal, and make such provisions for defense as may be necessary for the safety and protection of said canal and harbors. That the President is authorized for the purposes aforesaid to employ such persons as he may deem necessary, and to fix their compensation.

SEC. 4. That should the President be unable to obtain for the United States a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company and [such] the control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia and the rights mentioned in sections 1 and 2 of this act, within a reasonable time and upon reasonable terms, then the President, having first obtained for the United States [similar] exclusive and perpetual control by treaty of the necessary territory from Costa Rica and Nicaragua, upon terms which he may consider reasonable, for the construction, perpetual maintenance, operation, and protection of a canal connecting the Caribbean Sea with the Pacific Ocean by what is commonly known as the Nicaragua route, shall [direct the Secretary of War] cause to [excavate] be excavated and [construct] constructed a ship canal and waterway from a point on the shore of the Caribbean Sea near Greytown, by way of Lake Nicaragua, to a point near Brito on the Pacific Ocean.

Said canal shall be of sufficient capacity and depth to afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing through the same from [Greytown to Brito] ocean to ocean; and [the Secretary of War] he shall also construct such safe and commodious harbors at the termini of said canal as shall be necessary for the safe and convenient use thereof, and shall make such provisions for defense as may be necessary for the safety and protection of said harbors and canal; and such sum or sums of money as may be agreed upon by such treaty as compensation to be paid to Nicaragua and Costa Rica for the concessions and rights hereunder provided to be acquired by the United States, are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid on warrant or warrants drawn by the President.

The President shall cause such surveys as may be necessary for said canal and harbors to be made, and in making such surveys and in the construction of said canal may employ such persons as he may deem necessary, and may fix their compensation.

In the excavation and construction of said canal the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua, or such parts of each as may be made available, shall be used.

SEC. 5. That the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, toward the project herein contemplated by either route so selected.

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to enter into such contract or contracts as may be deemed necessary for the proper excavation, construction, completion, and defense of said canal, harbors, and defenses, by the route finally determined upon under the provisions of this act. Appropriations therefore [may] shall from time to time be hereafter made, not to exceed in the aggregate the additional sum of $135,000,000 should the Panama route be adopted, or $180,000,000 should the Nicaragua route be adopted.

SEC. 6. That in any agreement with the Republic of Colombia, or with the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, the President is authorized to guarantee to said Republic or to said States the use of said canal and harbors, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, for all vessels owned by said States or by citizens thereof.

SALARIES OF POST-OFFICE CLERKS.

After Mr. PETTUS'S speech,

Mr. MASON. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 4949) to provide for the classification of the salaries of clerks employed in post-offices of the first and second classes. It was up yesterday.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senator will not do that. It will take but a moment. No one objects to the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 19, 1902, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 18, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 11412.
There was no objection.

SANTA FE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10299) authorizing the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company to sell or lease its railroad property and franchises, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, which were read.
Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.
The motion was agreed to.
On motion of Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SHALLENBERGER, for ten days, on account of important business.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Alabama suggests that he wants to enter a motion to reconsider and let it be pending.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, by request of my friend from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], who voted in the negative, I voting in the affirmative, on House bill 53 last night, he desires to have a motion to reconsider pending. Therefore I move, at his request, to reconsider the vote for the engrossment and third reading of the bill.
The SPEAKER. What was the title of the bill?
Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was House bill 53.
The SPEAKER. There was no bill of such number under consideration. Can the gentleman state the title of the bill?
Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is in reference to the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations.
Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that there was no record vote on that. The third reading was denied.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I am not going to ask for a vote. I merely wish, at the request of the gentleman from Texas, to enter a motion to reconsider.
The SPEAKER. That was House bill 103, to open for settlement 480,000 acres of land in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations in Oklahoma Territory.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make a motion to reconsider at the request of the gentleman from Texas.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the bill to be engrossed.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. And let it be pending.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the District of Columbia appropriation bill with the amendments by the Senate, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the District of Columbia appropriation bill, disagree to the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair announces the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. MCCLEARY, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. BENTON.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committtee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the general appropriation bill; and, pending that motion, I would be glad if I can by unanimous consent fix a time for general debate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What time does the gentleman want to close?

Mr. CANNON. As early as possible. Is the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] in his seat?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I represent him.

Mr. CANNON. I merely wanted to know what arrangement we could make, if he was here, because he had talked with me about it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. He has just left. He communicated with me.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman from Georgia, with the statement that to-morrow we commence under the special order with the insular bill—this bill ought to be completed to-day, and I am going to ask the House to sit until it is completed. Well, now, with that statement, what arrangement can we make as to when we shall close general debate?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We want about two and a half hours on this side.

Mr. CANNON. We can not agree to that. That would mean five hours' debate if we had the same on this side, and it would take all of the session. Now, at this stage of the session, it seems to me we ought to get along with a less amount of time.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman says "at this stage of the session." Will the gentleman kindly inform us when he expects the session to end?

Mr. CANNON. It shall not be my fault if it does not end before the 4th of July. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 15108, and pending that——

Mr. CANNON. And pending that, Mr. Speaker, I am trying to arrange about general debate being closed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have stated the time that we wanted. Now, what will the gentleman concede to us? I do not see how we can get along on this side with much less than that. Mr. RICHARDSON, the minority leader, wants an hour or an hour and a half, and I want to secure it for him if I can. If you will give us two hours that will give him an hour or an hour and a half, and I can use the other half hour myself.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if the gentleman from Georgia wants an hour and a half for the purpose indicated we will get through on this side in an hour, and that will make two hours and a half.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Two hours and a half to this side?

Mr. CANNON. No; an hour and a half for your side and an hour for this side, and I hope we shall not use the whole hour.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And if you do not, I can get the other half hour? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Tennessee, like all the rest of us, want to get on as rapidly as we can.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Very well; we will take an hour and a half on this side.

Mr. CANNON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate close in two hours and a half, one hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia and one hour for this side.

The SPEAKER. Not to exceed two hours and a half. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate shall not exceed two hours and a half, one hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia and the other hour by the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The motion of Mr. CANNON was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair) for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15108) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is the first time since I have been a member of Congress that I have offered remarks not directed entirely to the bill under consideration. And I would not at this time seek to offer remarks of this character if the subject which I propose to discuss had not been substantially a living question before Congress for many years, and in my own State a question that has apparently become paramount to all others in the political field.

I shall discuss, Mr. Chairman, without passion, and without intended malice toward anyone, but with the object of presenting to the House and to the country a fair statement, as I see it, regarding the question of salaries of postal employees. It is a question of interest to the great majority of the House, and it may be that there are some members of the House, and possibly some gentlemen in the country, who do not thoroughly understand the question which has been discussed, though briefly, for a number of years.

There has been for more than ten years some considerable agitation regarding the increase of salaries of post-office clerks, railway mail clerks, letter carriers, and fourth-class postmasters; that including, I believe, all that have made, at least, combined efforts before Congress to increase their salaries, I am one who believes that the Government, in common with all who employ labor, should pay that labor a good living salary. I believe the Government should pay as large a salary as any private individual pays, and no more. The Government service is the best service in this country, as it is in all others. Probably, as matter of fact, a man who works for the Government, if he is to be paid upon the same plane with the rest of the people, should receive a less per diem than he would receive from a private individual. The reason for that is that the Government is a liberal employer. It grants leaves of absence, and its employment is permanent at all times. Whether times be dull or times be good, the Government employee's salary goes on steadily forever. In private vocations you will see the trend of wages is upward and downward, as there may be a demand for labor; but with the Government employee, his salary never goes backward, and is not affected by dull times.

The measure which I shall particularly discuss is the increase of salaries of the letter carriers. I shall discuss it comparatively with the wages paid to 105,000 other postal employees and briefly and comparatively with the wages earned by skilled mechanics throughout the country.

The average salary of the post-office clerk is about $800 per year. The average salary of the railway mail clerk is about $1,020 a year. The average salary of the letter carrier is about $918 a year. The service of the letter carrier, based on the examination for entry and by the Department, is held to be the lowest branch of the postal service. Yet I think I can show to the House that letter carriers receive a greater amount of money in net dollars than any other branch of postal employees as a class.

I said the railway mail clerk received an average salary of about $1,020 and the letter carrier $918; but it must be borne in mind that the railway mail clerk is compelled, by reason of his vocation and his absence from home, to expend at least $100 a year for his meals and his sleeping apartments while away from his domicile. According to the statement of men who are probably more familiar with the subject than I am, the amount is $150 a year. As I said before, the average salary of the post-office clerk is about $800.

Now, the particular agitation is for the increase of the salary of letter carriers to $1,200 a year. What I want to call the attention of the House to is this as a fundamental proposition: If the letter carriers are worth $1,200 a year, a post-office clerk is worth $1,400 a year, and a railway mail clerk is worth $1,600 a year. From that standpoint I propose to discuss this question. I do not believe there is a man familiar with the postal service who will gainsay that fundamental statement.

The salaries of the railway mail clerks are fixed by Congress substantially at every session within a certain maximum. The salary of the post-office clerk is fixed within a certain statutory maximum at every session of Congress. The letter carriers, however, are an excepted class of people, privileged beyond all other Government employees of the United States in this respect, that the letter carriers' salary advances by law irrespective of the merits of the man.

When I offered that suggestion to the president of the Letter Carriers' Association, he said to me, "Why, no; you do not have to advance the letter carrier from $600 to $800 and from $800 to $1,000. You can dismiss him." Well, yes; we can either dismiss him or promote him under the law.

I was at the Post-Office Department the other day and tried to secure some estimate of what a bill on this basis in its effect upon other employees would cost the country; and I asked a gentleman in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General who has something to do with the Railway Mail Service to "give me an estimate of how much it would cost the country if the railway mail clerks receiving, as now, $800 when appointed should be advanced at the end of one year to $1,000 and at the end of another year to $1,200 and at the end of another year to $1,400." "Why," he said, "you do not intend to enact any such legislation as that, do you?" "Well," said I, "that is not what I came here for. I simply want the figures as to how much it would cost." "Why," said he, "legislation of that character would destroy the Railway Mail Service, because the only hope of any service is in holding out hope of promotion to the officer by reason of his individual efficiency."

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] yield?

Mr. LOUD. I do not like to do so, for I have only half an hour; but I yield.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does not the gentleman from California think that in his presentation of this question at the present time he is taking a rather unfair advantage of those who favor the bill for increasing the salaries of the letter carriers?

Mr. LOUD. I do not think so, because I am going to present to this House a few fundamental facts which any man can acquaint himself with.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But to which we have no opportunity to reply.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I think you have.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If we had your bill or the report of your committee before us, the case would be different.

Mr. LOUD. I think the gentleman or anybody else can reply to my remarks. He can have my time on the Philippine bill if he wants to reply and thinks he can do so.

Now, I say again, Mr. Chairman, that the system of promotion of the letter carrier is absolutely wrong in principle or it is absolutely right in principle; and if right in principle, then these 105,000 other men should be put upon exactly the same plane as the 15,000. That is the only position I propose to take. I submit that if it appears to be the wisdom of Congress to promote post-office employees by law rather than by efficiency, then it is only justice that the 105,000 employees should be put upon exactly the same plane as the 15,000. I do not, however, favor legislation of that character, because I do not believe that a man should receive promotion in this or any other service unless he can show his efficiency year by year. As the gentleman up in the Post-Office Department said to me, "If legislation of that character were put upon the statute books, it would totally destroy the efficiency of the Railway Mail Service." Well, it can not destroy the efficiency of the letter-carrier service, because we have always had that system.

I know gentlemen say that letter carriers' work is all the same. I say there are very few men created either mentally or physically exactly alike. Under existing law, a man seeking the position of letter carrier takes an examination very simple in character—much more simple than the examination for post-office clerk, much more simple than the examination for railway mail clerk—so simple an examination that it is just above the examination for laborer. The carrier is appointed at $600 a year; at the end of a year he gets $800; at the end of another year he gets $1,000. It does not make any difference whether he is a most efficient carrier or whether he be a most ordinary carrier.

Now, let us see whether the work is all alike or not. From 15 to 20 per cent of the letter carriers are collectors. All they do is to open a letter box, take the mail out, put it into a sack, take it to the post-office, and dump it out upon a table; and from personal experience I know that men who are unfitted for carriers, by reason of some conditions, having been tested as carriers and found unfitted to perform that work, are put on as collectors. I know that some men who have physical infirmities, and the men who are old in the service and can not possibly carry a route, are made collectors. Now, what that legislation proposes to do is to pay every one of these men in a city over 75,000 inhabitants $1,200 a year so long as they may live. That will take in this 20 per cent of the force, mind you. Now, you can do it if you want to, but I do not intend that Congress or the country shall do this, if I can prevent it, until they do it with their eyes wide open.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH rose.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would rather not be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LOUD. If I had the time, you know I would like to yield. Let us see what this will cost to put these men all on the same basis. The question of cost, of course, is so insignificant that it is hardly worthy of consideration by a great legislative body, yet if the carriers shall be increased to $1,200 per annum, then in order to put the rest of the postal service upon the same basis it will involve an annual expenditure, according to the figures of the Post-Office Department, of about $10,000,000 a year—which I firmly believe is two or three millions of dollars less than it would cost, because they have all figured conservatively in giving the figures to me—thus adding to the salary roll of the Post-Office Department more than $10,000,000 a year.

Oh, I know some people here say, You do not have to do this; you will not have to increase the salary of the post-office clerks; you will not have to increase the salary of the railway mail clerks. But Congress ought to do such an act of justice. Simply because the pressure is greater behind the letter carriers' salary bill than behind any other is no reason why Congress should single them out, because, as I say—and I make the statement without fear of successful contradiction—they receive an average of more net dollars per annum than the 105,000 other postal employees. Well, now, some think thay can make politics out of that. They are trying to do it in my State; trying very hard. I believe every Republican club that has met in my State up to the present time has not alone advocated but substantially demanded that I press to early passage the letter carriers' salary bill as a political proposition. But I say that it is not a political proposition to take 15,000 of the best paid men in the postal service and increase their salaries and leave 105,000 others outside.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from California will not suggest that that is the inspiration of this bill. There are men here who consider it on its merits, even though he does not.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE rose.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I have the reputation of stating what I want to [laughter], and I will say to the gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of the Appropriation Committee yielded a half hour to me, and I will not have time in that half hour to answer questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman prefers not to be interrupted.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentlemen understand that I court interruption if I have the time. I think I understand the question quite as well as either the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] or the gentleman from the great city of New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE].

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question about it; that is all.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman knows that questions take up time. I propose to take up some of the questions that have been urged on behalf of the letter carriers as to why they should receive greater compensation at our hands than anybody else. It has been urged that they have to serve four and five years as a substitute. It is false. It never had foundation in fact. Here, according to the Post-Office Department, I find the average term of a carrier serving as a substitute is one year and seven months, given here by cities.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT
FREE-DELIVERY SYSTEM, DIVISION OF CITY DELIVERY,
Washington, March 22, 1902.

Hon. E. F. LOUD,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In response to your request of the 15th instant, I have the honor to transmit herewith a statement showing the average length of service of substitute carriers for the last ten years in the twenty largest cities in the United States.

Very respectfully,

J. M. MASTEN,
Acting First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Average length of service of substitute carriers, for the last ten years, at the twenty largest cities in the United States.

General average, 19 months, or 1 year and 7 months.

A statement was made before the Post-Office Committee not long ago that they had to work every Sunday. It is false. It never had foundation in fact. They do work Sundays, and I will print this table in my remarks to show that they averageon Sundays about one hour and twelve minutes—in some places a little less and in some a little more; but they work either every third Sunday three or four hours or every fourth Sunday, and in no city of the United States are carriers expected or compelled, according to the authority of the Post-Office Department, to work every Sunday, but, the same as post-office clerks, every third or fourth Sunday they go down and take a short shift at work.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPT. FREE-DELIVERY SYSTEM,
DIVISION OF CITY DELIVERY,
Washington, June 4, 1902.

Hon. E. F. LOUD,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your inquiry as to the number of hours carriers are required to work on Sunday, I have the honor to submit the following:

Number of free-delivery offices in operation	922
Number at which no Sunday service whatever is required	78

From the data at hand it is estimated that the carriers at the 53 first-class offices, employing three grades, average one hour and twenty-two minutes per carrier each Sunday. At the second-class or smaller offices, employing two grades, the average is one hour and forty-eight minutes per carrier each Sunday, the average throughout the service being one hour and thirty-two minutes.

For your further information I make the following statement relative to the service in New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago:

In New York 575 carriers are employed each Sunday for three hours and twenty-five minutes each. Averaging this among the 1,629 carriers employed in that city we find the average for the entire force to be one hour and twelve minutes per carrier.

In Philadelphia 25 per cent of the delivery carriers are employed every Sunday, so that each carrier is required to report for duty every fourth Sunday and is on duty for three hours.

Thirty-eight per cent of the collectors are on duty for six hours and thirty minutes each Sunday, so that the collectors practically work one Sunday and have two Sundays off, while the carriers work one Sunday and have three Sundays off.

This would make the average for the entire force fifty-eight minutes per carrier each Sunday.

In Chicago the carriers are worked as follows:

Seven hundred and sixty-eight carriers, two hours and thirty-five minutes every second Sunday.

Three hundred and ninety-six carriers, three hours and ten minutes every third Sunday.

Four carriers, one hour and forty-five minutes every Sunday.

Two collectors, one hour and three minutes every Sunday.

Two hundred and one collectors, three hours and thirty minutes every second Sunday.

Twenty-four collectors, four hours every third Sunday.

Forty-four collectors, three hours and thirty minutes every fourth Sunday.

Ten collectors, four hours and thirty minutes every fifth Sunday.

Fourteen collectors, two hours and thirty minutes every seventh Sunday.

Ten carriers do no work.

A careful computation shows that the average for the entire force at Chicago is one hour and twelve minutes per carrier each Sunday.

Very respectfully,

R. J. WYNNE,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Now, it has been urged that the poor carrier is subjected to the blasts of winter and the heat of summer. But let us see. I have had compiled here the length of time that our carrier friends are subjected to the blasts of winter and the heat of summer, and I will insert them in my remarks, which will show that the average time spent out in the blasts of winter and the heat of summer is an average of five hours and fifty-one minutes a day, divided up into three and one-third trips. Part of this time the carrier is in houses and stores, too; but the whole time, from the time that he leaves the office until he gets back to the office, on the average, can not exceed one hour and forty minutes. Think of it, you gentlemen from Minnesota and Wisconsin—subjected to the blasts of winter for an hour and forty minutes at a time!

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPT. FREE-DELIVERY SYSTEM,
DIVISION OF CITY DELIVERY,
Washington, March 18, 1902.

Hon. E. F. LOUD,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to your favor of the 15th instant, asking for certain information relative to the twenty largest cities of the country, I have the honor to inclose herewith statement showing the average time spent by regular letter carriers on their trips, the average number of trips made per carrier, and the office time of the carriers.

It will require considerable time to compile the information regarding substitute carriers, as the computation must be made from the office records. The statement is being prepared, and will be completed and forwarded to you as soon as possible.

Very respectfully,

W. M. JOHNSON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

[1] Average, 5 hours 51 minutes.
[2] About 3½ hours.
[3] Average, 2 hours 3 minutes.

This table also shows the average time worked by the letter carrier. In no city does he work the full eight hours, because it is impossible. If letter carriers happen to be caught in the office after the eight hours expire, oh, they have had lots of mercy on us! They have received four or five or six million dollars for overtime, time that never was worked in many instances, and I know whereof I speak, but simply time spent in the office and other places. And because of that custom, when the gentleman from Buffalo, Mr. Bissell, was Postmaster-General, he ordered the poor letter carriers outdoors in the cold blasts of winter, for which he was criticised by the press of the country. Why did he do it? Because they claimed time while they were toasting their feet against the stove, and the only way he could prevent this accumulation of overtime was by compelling them to leave the office. It is unfortunate that they should be put out in the cold, but if they had to charge the Government for warming their feet, the efficient Postmaster-General thought it was wise that they should go to some other stove where they could not charge the time up against the Government.

Now, I shall insert in my remarks here some tables regarding the income of others than postal employees. I shall insert this table here which has been inserted in tariff speeches, giving the scale beginning in 1840 and running up to 1899, taking 1860 as the base at 100 per cent, and while the claim is that the trend of wages has been upward, I say that in dollars the scale of wages has never yet reached the scale of 1873, the year of the demonetization of silver. I do not know what relation there is between the two, but the per cent of wages had run up then to 167.1. In 1899 it was 162. Of course I know people will say that they were paid in greenbacks, but they were paid in dollars current at that time.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The purchasing power of the dollar is larger now.

Mr. LOUD. Oh yes; the purchasing power of the dollar is greater than it was in 1873.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is what we contend.

Mr. LOUD. Of course you contend that, and he is now paid just as many dollars as he was then, with a greater purchasing power. The Government employee is no exception to the rule. He goes on. I will insert in my remarks here some tables prepared by the Commissioner of Labor, showing the income for different trades in the State of Pennsylvania. It was the only State, he said, in which they could furnish me with tables. I will assume that the average wage in the State of Pennsylvania is as great as it is in any State in the United States.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That takes in the miners, does it not?

Mr. LOUD. Well, we will see who it takes in. I will assume, however, that the architectural and cast and wrought iron men are not included in with miners. It includes 354 trades. Now, the highest income of any trade was the car-spring manufacturers, who, in the year 1900, had an average income of $783.54. Architectural and cast and wrought iron workers in 1900 were paid $545. In 1892 they were paid $600. You see, this income fluctuates by years. Some trades have gone up and some have gone down, but the letter carrier, as I said before, goes on forever.

Average yearly earnings of employees in 44 industries and 354 establishments in Pennsylvania for the years 1892 to 1900, inclusive.

Mr. MANN. Who compiled those statistics?

Mr. LOUD. They were compiled by the Commissioner of Labor, Mr. Wright, whose letter accompanies the table.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can the gentleman state how the salaries of letter carriers compare with the salaries of railway postal clerks?

Mr. LOUD. I stated at the opening of my remarks that the letter carrier makes to-day more net dollars than the railway mail clerk.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the relative time employed?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, well, I do not think there is much difference. Of course the railway mail clerks work longer shifts—twelve, fourteen, sixteen, and eighteen hours—but they get the consequent lay-offs. The average time put in by the railway mail clerk is a little less than eight hours, the same as it is by the carrier.

Now I quote from a report made as to Kansas. The trade reports, however, are very meager. I have not picked these out to suit myself; I have only taken such as the Commissioner of Labor furnished me, and have had to accept them. Here is a report of the wages of different wage-earners, by occupations, in the State of Kansas:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Illinois said he would yield me more time if I desired it.

Mr. CANNON. I yield fifteen minutes additional to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I told the gentleman I would try to get through in half an hour, if I could. I should like to have more time, so that gentlemen could ask me any questions they desired.

I find, according to this Kansas report, that the yearly income of railway trainmen in the State of Kansas, who are the highest paid men in this country engaged in any mechanical trade, and this includes engineers, conductors, firemen, and brakemen—their average annual income is $980.08.

With the railroad trainmen the same rule is applicable as that to the railway mail clerk. He is absent from home and his expenses, necessarily additional, are the same as the railway mail clerk, which will run from $100 to $150 a year. So that the carrier makes more net money than the railway trainmen of the country. In that table is also included other railway employees whose salaries average $641.27; in the building trade, $520.64. I will also incorporate that in my remarks.

Mr. GILBERT. What document is that?

Mr. LOUD. This is a report from the commissioner of labor in Kansas. It is included in "Bulletin, Department of Labor, No. 38."

I will also file with my remarks the income of the substitute carrier, compiled here from 20 cities. We could not get all of the cities, but I assume the 20 cities are a fair average. The average amount is $390 a year during his term as substitute, which is about $32 or $33 a month from the very time that they begin work.

Very respectfully,

J. M. MASTEN,
Acting First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Now, I would like to know in what vocation a young man would enter in any commercial house that he would get $32 or $33 the first month or the first year. I have been interested in several boys in my life, and have helped to put them into large commercial houses, where they may be fitted for combat with life, and I find that they get about $20 a month in my country when they go in as boys. Of course there are some men who become carriers after they are 34 years of age and have families, and maintain that it is a very small amount to receive. But let me ask why do they become carriers? Because life has practically been a failure with them in contact with the rest of our people up to that time.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. When they get very old and infirm, too, they get no pension.

Mr. LOUD. That is true; but our friends, the letter carriers, have been here with a bill for pension. They withdrew that bill for pension of 60 to 75 per cent of full salary, and now only urge a bill to increase the salaries up to $1,200.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. There is no such proposition as that now.

Mr. LOUD. There is no such proposition as that now, but I will add that, as chairman of that committee for a number of years, what I am saying to the House is in the best of faith to you, and I think the House ought to be informed. They concluded that they would withdraw the pension bill until they got $1,200 a year, and I think no one will contradict or will deny that that is their intent; and, that after they shall have pushed through Congress a bill to pay them $1,200 a year compulsory, whether they be good, bad, or indifferent, whether they carry in the best district in a city or are collectors, then they will come to you for pensions. And then gentlemen talk about all carriers being alike. Why, many times in my city a carrier has come to me and said, "My district is so hard that I can not carry it. I can not do that work."

Many times I have gone to the superintendent and told him that, and he replied, "I will detail carrier 'Smith' for a week;" and when he has done that for a week he has said, "It is the easiest thing I have had." Now, do you ask me if carriers are alike? I say no. If you ever talk about carrier legislation, you should not contemplate paying them all the same salary. I think they ought to be advanced, if advanced at all, a hundred a year on efficiency, and not by law.

Now, I must hurry on. I can not attempt to suggest to this House further what it ought to do. If the House takes up this legislation, it it must do that, let it do an act of justice to all the postal employees, and if you are going to do that, it will increase the salary roll from ten to twelve or fifteen million dollars a year.

Now, then, one more thought about letter carriers and I am done. I want to make this broad statement: While the carriers have used every means in their power to secure the passage of this bill, many means which I have no right or desire to criticise, I say that they have come to Congress with unclean hands, and in a court of equity would have no standing, neither can they have before this legislative body. I have never had any doubt but that Congress would do what its judgment dictated ultimately. The Letter Carriers' Association in 1899 levied an assessment on its members of $10 a head, which assessment would have returned from $120,000 to $150,000. For what purpose? I do not think anybody questions but that that assessment was levied.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I have heard it denied.

Mr. LOUD. I will put in my remarks the proof, or I would not have made the statement. I want to say, in justice to the carriers, that they protested, or that a majority of the branches protested. The matter went before the Scranton convention and was referred to the branches, and a majority of the branches protested against the assessment, and yet the assessment was made. In many instances it was paid, and while an offer to return the money was made, some of them, at least, I am informed, have refused to accept the return of that money and it lies subject to order.

In this connection I want the Clerk to read a speech of James Arkison, of Fall River, Mass. Let us see if there is any doubt as to whether the assessment was ever levied, and let us see some of the instruments with which they have worked.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Speech of James Arkison, Fall River, Mass., chairman of the National Association of Letter Carriers, September, 1899.]

Now, brothers, in regard to the financial report read here by the secretary; it was misleading to a great many members. They charge so much to James Arkison, chairman of the legislative committee, and so much to Arkison again, and it is James Arkison all through the report; he is the fellow taking all the money. Let me say to you, we do not see anybody else on that committee, or anything else that is shown in the expenses. One man has got to take the burden, and I am the man who takes it. And whatever you do, if you will stand by the man you elect, the officers and the legislative committee, if any men of this country are brought in to help to do your work, all the expense will be charged to the chairman of the legislative committee; there will be no other person.

If at this convention every man voted that I should disclose the names of the men who have assisted us in legislation, I would not do it for the whole convention. The expense of the committee for the year has been $4,650, and that is less than it has been for the last seven or eight years.

* * * * * * *

This slandering of the national officers has got to stop, or somebody will be brought up with a very short turn. There is a limit to it. I stand ready to face any branch in the country, the officials of the departments, the Supreme Court, or injunctions; but when you trust any work to me and the convention votes for it, I will carry it out under the direction of the officers; and if they say carry it out in secret, all the men in this country can not get me to say anything. They can kick me out. That is all they can do.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does this gentleman belong to the Letter Carriers' Association now?

Mr. LOUD. I will admit that he is not now a member of the legislative committee of the Letter Carriers' Association. I do not know whether he is a carrier or not. And yet Mr. Parsons and this gentleman were continued in office in 1899 after that exposé. They were reelected, I believe, again in 1900, and in 1901, when it was discovered that this legislation had not been accomplished, Mr. Parsons was thrown to the rear, and a new deal was had, and, in my opinion, lack of success more than anything else was the cause of his downfall. Yet let me state that their per capita tax was increased to $2 a man. This legislative fund at that time was abolished, and all of the money went into one fund.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Right at that point I think it is due to state, if the gentleman knows, whether the same methods that he condemns and everybody of sense condemns are applied to-day in any way, shape, or form. I do not understand that they are, and if they are not, give them credit for it.

Mr. LOUD. These are very difficult subjects to deal with. I will not make a statement one way or the other. The gentleman from Michigan does not deny any longer that this assessment was levied?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No; but I never heard of it before.

Mr. LOUD. Now, I hold in my hand the protest of Branch No. 24, of Los Angeles, and they deserve credit for it. By the way, some one borrowed the one I had. I thought I put it in a safe place, and I got this one by sending some distance for it. They say:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LETTER CARRIERS, BRANCH NO. 24,
Los Angeles, Cal., June 7, 1899.

To all branches and members of the National Association of Letter Carriers of the United States, greeting:

In accordance with a series of resolutions passed by Branch No. 24, of Los Angeles, Cal., at the last regular monthly meeting, held June 3, a committee was appointed, whose names are appended hereto, who were instructed to draft an address to all other branches, setting forth the action of this branch in reference to the recent assessment of $10 per capita levied on the membership by the president of the association and the executive board thereof.

* * * * * * *

This assessment, if paid, will aggregate between $120,000 and $150,000, and on and after September 1 next would be at the absolute call and disposal of the executive board, none of whom are under bonds for the safe custody and proper disposition of so large a fund. As we have no legitimate and proper use for so large a sum of money, it would obviously be unwise and unsafe to invite extravagance, corruption, and dishonesty by placing such a sum at the absolute disposal of an irresponsible board of officials—the more so as the national convention will meet in Scranton, Pa., a few days after the assessment becomes due and payable and at the disposal of the executive board. This convention, it may safely be assumed, are much more competent to decide as to advisability of the accumulation of so large a sum than the president and executive board, whose services as officers of the association may terminate at that time.

This branch has reason to believe that the proceeds of $10 per capita assessment are intended to be used corruptly and illegally in influencing Congressional legislation in our favor. The address given here by the vice-president confirms us in this opinion. His address was an argument in favor of using any methods to effect our purpose, that bribery and corruption were universal, and that the use of money liberally was absolutely essential to the securing of legislation in our behalf; that such men as—

I will not mention the names of these people, because they are now living—were successful men, their prestige not affected unfavorably by their peculiar methods of "doing politics."

We can readily believe that those born and brought up in an atmosphere of political rottenness and corruption such as obtains in New York City and San Francisco should take that view of it.

* * * * * * *

It is already known through an Associated Press dispatch that the Chicago carriers, under the potent influence of the president of the Letter Carriers' Association, have "enthusiastically" voted to raise $200,000 as a fund to be used in effecting legislation to "increase their salaries," the fund to be placed in the hands of the board of trustees who are to "engineer the scheme," as the press dispatch expressed it.

This is a very interesting document.

Mr. PEARRE. May I ask the gentleman whether he lives at San Francisco? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; that is my home, and the gentleman knew it. I will make this statement, however, which I did not care to make, that the president of the Letter Carriers' Association did say to me that "if this bill is reported from your committee I will enter into an agreement that it shall not be considered at this session of Congress." Now, as to whether they are using these things politically for themselves or not I will leave the gentleman to determine. They elect this fall a president for two years.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. They are not the only people who postpone important legislation.

Mr. LOUD. Now, then, in conclusion, let me say again that the letter carriers, as a class, receive more net dollars per year than either railway mail clerks, post-office clerks, third or fourth class postmasters, or any class of skilled mechanics. Railway mail clerks' salaries were reduced in 1885, the trend of salaries of post-office clerks being also downward from 1885 to 1897. The Post-Office Department recommended that some action be taken looking to an increase of their salaries, and Congress has responded year by year, but they have not yet reached the scale of the letter carriers, who have never yet received a favorable recommendation from the Department for an increase.

The salaries of all third and fourth class postmasters were reduced 33⅓ per cent in 1885, when postage was reduced from 3 to 2 cents, and no action has yet been taken looking to an increase.

I will not attempt to say whether Congress should increase all along the line the salaries of Government employees who are now annually receiving 25 per cent more than men in like or similar positions in civil life, but I have no hesitation in saying that if action is taken it should be along the whole line, an action that will put all post-office employees upon the same plane, considering, of course, the character and grade of work performed by each.

I can not too strongly condemn a system of compulsory promotions under authority of statute, such as the letter carriers now have, as tending to destroy the efficiency of the postal service. Hope is the guiding star of civilization. Take from man the hope of doing better by his own personal effort and you remove civilization, advancement, and happiness. [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, nearly seven long months have come and gone into the silent past since the present Congress assembled. Now, as we near the close of the session it is eminently proper that some one should review its acts of omission and commission and present to the country a kind of balance sheet of its doings. I regret that some one better qualified than myself has not undertaken to make this accounting.

At the outset I desire to say that it is a source of congratulation at this time to all Democrats, and should be to the whole country, that the Democratic party is now more united, and there is more harmony in its ranks, not only in Congress, but throughout the Union, than at any time within the past eight years. While this is true, there is more of discord and a greater want of harmony in the dominant party in Congress and out of Congress than has existed in that organization for a long period.

It must be borne in mind that the Republican party is now, and has been for nearly six years, in the absolute and supreme control of the Government in all its branches and departments. That is to say, it has had the President and the complete control of both branches of Congress since early in 1897. The power given to a political party by the people of this Republic when, by an affirmative vote, they place it into the full control of the affairs of the country is very vast, almost beyond realization. This vote of power carries with it immense duties and responsibilities. To obtain it platforms are adopted and pledges solemnly and publicly given by the political parties to the electors who make and unmake administrations.

It is therefore never out of place to call upon the party in power for an accounting as to the mode and manner of its execution of the high trust with which it stands solemnly charged. I purpose in the remarks I am now to submit to make some inquiry into the trusteeship of the dominant party for the past six years, and to call upon it for an accounting as to its administration of government.

I admit that I do not make the investigation as a member of the party or the trust now in charge of the government or even as a political friend and ally of the dominant party, but it is better, probably, for the investigation that I am not in partnership with them. A proper investigation can not well be made by a member of that party. Reforms are not usually brought about when conducted within a political organization, and I am here to insist that reforms, radical and far-reaching in their nature and effect, are imperatively demanded.

The party in power was intrusted by the people at the election in 1896 with full governmental control upon express promises given by the party prior to the election. They can not complain if they are asked to be held to a strict fulfillment of those pledges, and if it be shown that they have been derelict in keeping and observing them that they should receive the condemnation which their infidelity to them merits.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding or mistake as to the issue to be joined by myself as against the party in power, I charge at the outset that its record during the past six years is spotted all over with the indelible leprosy of faithlessness to its pledges made to a confiding constituency. It has inexcusably failed in some instances to do what it promised and pledged itself to do if given power, and it has done things it should not have done and for which it should be discredited and voted out of power by the American people. I will endeavor to enumerate some of its violated platform and other pledges solemnly made in order to obtain the reins of government, but for want of time will not be able to refer to all of them.

For some reason we are now, to-day, confronted by a peculiar and novel condition of affairs in Congress in respect to the unfulfilled promises of the party of reasonable trade concessions to Cuba. These concessions they have bound themselves to give that island. Because of discord in the ranks of this party, and a rebellion on the part of certain of its members in this body and in another body not necessary to mention against its trained leaders, these promises and pledges are unredeemed, and the urgent recommendations of the President and the entire Administration to redeem them are disregarded and set at naught.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman state when and by whom those pledges were made?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes; I will. As I stated, the President has, first in his annual message and then in a special message within the last few days, reminded the party and the country of those pledges.

Inspired by patriotic motives, this side of the House went to the relief of the dominant party and assisted in passing through this body the measure to give trade concessions to Cuba, but we did not do this until there was placed upon it a proper amendment repealing the differential duty on sugar. This amendment injuriously affects the sugar trust, and for this, or some other reason, deponent sayeth not what, the Republican party refuses to pass the measure and keep its promises and maintain good faith toward Cuba.

In 1896 the party pledged itself to save the country if possible from the gold standard, and reiterated assurances and pledges it had given in its national platforms of 1884, 1888, and 1892 that the party was in favor of bimetallism. It promised with an audacity unparalleled that if intrusted by the people with power it would promote international bimetallism. It totally and ingloriously violated this promise, and instead thereof proceeded to enact legislation committing the country to the single gold standard.

They passed what they called the gold-standard act March 14, 1900, and whether this policy was right or wrong, wise or unwise, I am not now inquiring; I am only saying it was a palpable violation of ante-election pledges. To enact that legislation after obtaining power upon the strength of pledges and promises in direct opposition to that policy was a base violation of the trust committed to their hands and was the building by that party of an enduring monument to its own perfidy and unfaithfulness. The passage of that currency act was in flagrant violation of all their former professions and ante-election pledges, and no election frauds or stuffing of ballot boxes in Philadelphia or elsewhere in all this land is of grosser immorality and more truly deserves the just condemnation of a betrayed people.

In its platform of 1900, when again asking for power and place, it pledged itself to the principles of the gold standard, which it declared it had set up and established in the act of March, 1900, and yet when the battle was on and the conflict was raging between the two great parties that same year, it declared through its chosen chief financial officer and mouthpiece, the Secretary of the Treasury, and many other lesser lights, that the gold-standard act was not safely on the statute books, and that unless he, or someone like unto himself, was kept in his office by a Republican President, that that standard was insecure, and that its blessings might not be enjoyed and made perpetual.

Although they had arrogantly boasted in their platform and on the hustings that "the parity of all our money and the stability of our currency on a gold basis had been secured," this Secretary of the Treasury and other leaders of his party brazenly announced to the voters and the country that "the parity of all the money had not been assured, and that the stability of all the currency on the gold basis" could be destroyed by a Presidential order.

If this latter statement was true, the real financial situation had hardly been changed or modified by the currency act of March, 1900, and thus this boasted act of Congress was proclaimed by the party itself to be a hollow mockery, and must have been passed either to deceive the country or it was evidence of the lack of ability of the party to enact intelligent legislation. They are left to take either horn of the dilemma. The argument made by the Secretary of the Treasury and other leaders of their party again beguiled the sovereign people, and a further lease of political power was given the dominant party.

The scarecrow of some Presidential order overturning the gold-standard act was held up on every stump throughout the campaign, and fervid appeals were made to capitalists, and indeed to all classes, to once more give the dominant party power that this defect, or alleged defect, discovered by the astute Secretary of the Treasury, in the currency act might be corrected and the country saved from irretrievable misfortune and disaster.

It was, therefore, most natural to expect that when the opportunity was again given to the dominant party to cure the alleged defect in the law and an opportunity be given to place the stability of the gold standard beyond the power of destruction by Executive or Presidential orders, that no time would be lost by them in the enactment of such legislation. They promised that if power be continued in their hands, that the gold standard and the parity of all our money would be conclusively established.

Yet when the Congress, Republican in both branches, assembled in December, 1900, just subsequent to the election of that year, although their promise and pledge to cure the defects in the law mentioned were fresh in their minds and in the minds of the American people, they permitted that session of Congress to close without any effort to amend the currency law. And so again, this session of Congress convened on the first Monday of December last, and although we are now near its close, not one line of remedial or alleged remedial legislation of the currency act of 1900 has been enacted. If any such remedial or amendatory act has been considered by the dominant party, or even introduced into Congress, it has been permitted to sleep unnoticed by the powers that be.

The conclusion is therefore inevitable that the party discredits their great financial oracle, the late Secretary of the Treasury, and gives no weight to his alarming prophecy of disaster to the business interests of the country in the event of defeat to that organization. In consideration of these facts and the light of history, may we not charge that when the party, through its Secretary of the Treasury, sounded the alarm I have mentioned, and assumed to rally the people around the financial saviors of the country, his party was simply building another monument, not this time one of perfidy, but one of its twin sister, hypocrisy.

Not having witnessed since the last election any effort to enact legislation to place the gold standard and the parity and stability of all our money beyond the power of Executive disturbance, we may safely assume that in the next campaign we will not be told that there is any danger to be apprehended or injury to come to the country or its business interests from this source, no matter what may be the result of the election. But I will here dismiss this subject.

If I were called upon to name the agency or factor in American affairs at this time most dangerous to our institutions and threatening to their permanency, I would name the trusts. This may seem on casual thought to be an exaggerated statement, but I verily believe it is true. Some idea of the magnitude and extent of the trust business in our country may be had from a recent statement made by James J. Hill, in an address to the Illinois Manufacturers' Association. In this address he said that the capitalization of 183 American corporations, commonly called trusts, is, in round numbers, $5,000,000,000.

I have in my possession a printed list of these combinations which shows that there are more than 290 of them in this country. I believe this list is reliable, and it further shows that the capitalization of these corporations amounts to over $10,000,000,000. If we accept the more conservative of these two statements—that is, that the capitalization of the trusts amounts to $5,000,000,000—it is difficult for one to realize what is meant by the statement. It means that the capitalization of these concerns exceeds the total stock of money of the United States by $2,000,000,000, of Great Britain by nearly $3,000,000,000, and of Germany by about $4,000,000,000.

In other words, the total stock or capitalization of these 183 concerns, accepting Mr. Hill's statement, is more than the entire stock of money of the United States, Great Britain, and Germany combined. It is almost impossible to overstate or exaggerate the immense and almost limitless power they can exert in the forum of politics, in the marts of trade, and in social life. It should be borne in mind, too, that they constitute a new element in our trade and business operations and experience.

That they are a factor to be feared, and one that imperatively demands the strong hand of the Federal Government for control can not be denied, but must be apparent to all persons. If one doubted this, that doubt could be removed when he is reminded that one of these trusts has the power, and only recently exercised it, of extorting more than $1,000,000 in a single month from the consumers of one article of food over and above what would ordinarily have been taken from them, and that of prime necessity to them, in one city of our country.

This was done in Philadelphia, as was freely charged in the newspapers of that city, by an arbitrary raising of the price of beef, and when the state and condition of the meat market did not justify or warrant such increase in price. This is only a single specimen of what they can do, and are doing all the time and everywhere throughout the land. Other instances might be given, but time will not permit. A striking illustration of their marvelous influence and power will be found by consulting the price lists of to-day.

It will be seen from these lists that scores and hundreds of articles, the products of highly protected manufactures in this country, manipulated and controlled by the trust, are made and transported to foreign countries, all freights, duties, and other expenses paid there, where they are sold daily in the foreign market at prices considerably lower than those demanded and received from our home consumers in our home markets. I am not here demanding that these organizations shall be totally suppressed and destroyed by Congressional legislation. It may come to that later in our history. At present there comes up from every village and hamlet of this broad land an irrepressible cry for their government and control.

Congress alone can answer this cry and afford the desired relief. And why should they not be subjected to the domination and control of the Government? If they are not curbed and restrained in their oppressive and heartless commercial greed they will in time absorb all the wealth of the country and defy the power of the Government itself. They do not hesitate even now to make the boast that the life of the public man will be promptly taken by them if he has the temerity to attack them or to raise his voice against them. It can not be successfully denied that they are potent in politics.

I have already said they were of recent origin. This is true, as they were never heard of in our fair and happy land until it was afflicted with the highest protective tariff law ever known in any land or among any people. That this tariff is their mother we have the sworn testimony of many of their chief beneficiaries. These trust magnates, under oath, freely admit the parentage of the high protective tariff, and confess that without its benignant nursing and coddling they could not exist and would rapidly perish.

I said a moment ago that they were almost all-powerful in politics, and it is charged that they dominate and control the party in power. The strong arm of the Federal Government alone can govern them and stay their progress and stop their intolerable greed and prevent their cruel supremacy in all our markets. Will the Government stretch forth its restraining hand and do these things? What is the Government? At present it is a Republican President, with a Senate and House of Representatives with a large Republican majority in each body.

The power, and the power alone to save, is with the President and the Congress. The appeal for relief is made by a suffering people, but that appeal goes unheeded and is treated not alone with sordid silence but with contemptuous and devilish disdain. When the conditions have become unbearable and fervid appeals crowd thick and fast upon that forum, which alone can afford relief, a deaf ear is turned and the comforting answer is made that we "should let well enough alone."

Let me ask, to whom is it well enough? Surely not to those in one city from whom $1,000,000 is extorted without cause for beef in a single month. The party in power has heretofore recognized, and do now recognize, the evils of which we complain. In its national platforms it solemnly declared against trusts. It sought and obtained power upon an express promise to give relief to the country from their rapacity and unholy greed. I charge here that it has been recreant to that promise and pledge. That there may be no answer made to this grave charge here expressed, that I am mistaken or that I misrepresent that party, I will quote the declaration made by it in its national convention two years ago. I quote literally from their last platform the following words:

> We condemn all conspiracies and combinations intended to restrict business, to create monopolies, to limit production, or to control prices, and favor such legislation as will effectively restrain and prevent all such abuses, protect and promote competition, and secure the rights of producers, laborers, and all who are engaged in industries and commerce.

The language is, "We condemn all conspiracies and combinations intended to restrict business." This is a plain and simple declaration, but we have no evidence that it was made in sincerity. What they condemn in the words just quoted is exactly what these trusts do every day, and for which complaint is made. Who can remedy the complaint? The party alone which so severely condemns it in words.

If their condemnation was sincere why have they not legislated, and why do they not now legislate, to put a stop to these conspiracies and combinations intended to restrict and which do so effectively restrict business. The Republican party alone can apply the remedy, and although that party has been in the supreme and absolute control of all the branches of the Government for more than five years they have not within that time passed a line of legislation to put a stop to the great evil complained of.

No friend or apologist of the trust will deny that they create monopolies, limit productions, and control prices. If for these things they are condemned by the Republican party and by the whole people, I again ask, Why is the remedy not applied? The same platform declared that the Republican party "favored such legislation as would effectually restrain and prevent all such abuses." I again ask if this declaration was true? Was it not simply an ante-election declaration, made alone for the purpose of obtaining votes, and with no intention of enacting restraining legislation?

Again, that platform declared "that the Republican party favored such legislation as would protect and promote competition and secure the rights of producers, laborers, and all who are engaged in industry and commerce." Beautiful words and beautiful sentiment. But instead of being real and full of meaning, they can only be interpreted in the light of experience, as a tinkling cymbal and as sounding brass.

What has the Republican party ever done to remedy the trust evil. The reply comes glibly from some partisan of that party that in 1890 it placed on the statute books the Sherman antitrust law. Is that law sufficient? Why, under that statute these combinations have grown up like mushrooms in a dark cellar. That law has not put out of existence the trusts which had then been formed, nor has it prevented their enormous growth and increase in numbers. It is glaringly defective in its provisions, and should long since have been properly amended.

That act, however, provides for criminal prosecution of those engaged in these unlawful combinations. How many people have been indicted or punished under that law in the twelve years of its existence? How many trusts have been put out of existence by its operations? If it is defective, why has it not been amended and made effectual? Not a line has been added to this act of 1890 by the dominant party, though, as stated, it has been for a long time in the supreme control of the Government, and during which period these concerns have enormously multiplied.

Seeing that they had nothing to fear from Congress, and that no real efforts to stop the robbery of the trusts were being made, they have gone along in the broad open daylight with their nefarious work until nearly all the business of the people has been organized into monopolies and combinations, and the prices of commodities have been fictitiously forced upward to the consumers to the point of ruin, and billions of fictitious capitalization or watered stock in mighty companies have been enabled thereby to realize splendid dividends wrung from a helpless people for the necessary articles that enter into their daily cost of living.

I have referred to the abnormal condition in the meat market, brought about by the machinations of the trusts, and the exorbitant price to which they lifted the price of beef a few months ago. The claim was falsely set up by the trusts as a justification for this outrage that it was due to "the scarcity of cattle." To show conclusively that this was untrue and that there was no foundation for the defense they were falsely making, I call attention to the real facts as to the exports of meat products from this country at the very time they were making the claim that there was a scarcity of cattle here.

The Treasury export tables recently issued show that for the month of March, 1902, the United States exported meat as follows:

Fresh beef	$2,272,759
Salted or cured beef	315,900
Canned beef	465,284
Fresh and salted pork	1,037,572
Hams	2,061,932
Bacon	2,585,610
Total	8,739,357

This table shows that nearly $9,000,000 worth of American meats were sent abroad in the month of March, so that it appears that during this month, according to the contention of the beef trust, there was such a scarcity of cattle that it became necessary to advance the prices of meat to prices that were prohibitory to thousands and tens of thousands of families, and yet it could easily ship out of this country this enormous quantity of meat.

The facts show that the trust shipped this meat to Great Britain and other countries and sold it in their retail markets, and at prices considerably below the prices demanded from home consumers. The price list shows that on April 30 last American beef was selling in London at 14 cents a pound, which was 10 cents lower than the New York price for the same class of beef at that date, and yet Congress enacts no remedial legislation.

The result of the conspiracy to exact tribute from the people upon the beef they were compelled to buy, as shown by the market reports, has been a large falling off in its consumption. The consumers of beef have been compelled to resort to substitutes therefor, but the relief obtained in this way was only temporary, for forthwith the substitutes were cornered and their prices at once raised to exorbitant figures. Some persons resorted to poultry and eggs, but by a well-organized monopoly the retailers who dealt in chickens were forced to pay for them as high as 50 cents per pound.

The fresh eggs which formerly filled the market places now find their way into refrigerator cars and cold-storage depots until consumers are forced to pay the trusts and monopolies higher prices for their daily supply of stale poultry and eggs than ever before in our history. Monopolies like those which were granted by the Crown in France and in England three centuries ago, and which were finally consumed in the heat of popular rage and indignation, are now self-existent in this free country, and they virtually divide every man's beefsteak with him by cutting down the amount of it which he can buy for a dollar.

Conspiracies to raise the prices of the necessaries of life have been crimes at the common law in England for more than two hundred years. It is to be doubted if any European monarch could long maintain his seat on his throne if he allowed a grasping and heartless monopoly like the beef trust to put his people on an allowance of food as our own people are on an allowance to-day.

If the people continue to submit to the existing state of things by continuing the trusts in power in this Government, and fail to make a change in their servants at the ballot box, it would prove that they deserve their fate, and that they ought to be compelled to endure the evils of these combinations. It is absolutely sure that no remedy against the evils of monopoly will be furnished by the monopolists. It is also true that no forms of law can be placed on the statute book which will restrain trusts so long as the execution of these laws is left in the hands of the trusts.

If we would remedy these bad conditions the appeal for relief must be made, not to the trusts and monopolies, nor to any political party which they can control. The appeal will lie and must be made to the masses of the people who, in their every-day lives, feel the heavy hand of the trust upon their means of subsistence. It must be made to those who realize that the rise in the price of meat, cruelly made by the trusts, is theft from the poor man's dinner plate at home and from his dinner pail when he is at work.

The efficient and natural remedies for the unbearable evils complained of are of comparative easy application. There are two remedies for such evils. The one is through the tariff law and the other through governmental control. It is not necessary to resort to absolute free trade. Nor is it necessary to demand or require a total destruction of corporations. In very many instances corporations are necessary and beneficial agencies of activity, and serve to develop industrial exercise and many business interests. But being the creatures of the sovereign—that is, the artificial person created by law—the sovereign, the creator, may impose the conditions of their existence and place due and proper limits upon their operations. It is not their total destruction or prohibition that is demanded, but their control and government, so that, while being protected and fostered by the Government, neither it nor the people shall be injuriously affected by them.

In 1890, now twelve years ago, it was discovered that the power of the trusts was becoming so great that there should be some restraint placed upon them by Congress, and as a result the act known as the "Sherman antitrust law" was passed. I have already referred to this act. It has failed in its purpose. The necessity for its amendment is apparent and admitted, and yet it has not been amended by the Republican party. The subject was considered, and amendments to that law making it effectual were considered in the last Congress, which, as stated, was Republican in both branches, when the defects in the Sherman Act were fully pointed out and made clear.

The amendments curing the defects and the omissions in that act were then conclusively shown. No one contended that the Sherman Act was sufficient to accomplish the end desired, and no one controverted the fact that the bill then before Congress amending that act, and which was fully considered by the House, if enacted into law, would give relief to the people from the wicked oppression of these trusts.

The mockery and farce of the consideration of the bill for relief was gone through with, and although the people were unanimously in favor of its enactment and their representatives nearly so, it was put to sleep by the dominant party who controlled the Congress. Its passage was defeated by the Republican party. In the meantime "combinations and conspiracies intended to restrict business" have multiplied in number like the locusts of Egypt. The end of this session of Congress, Republican in both branches, is in sight, and yet no measure of relief has been passed or even considered.

Even the efforts put forth by the party in power in the last Congress to pass a repressive measure has not been repeated during this Congress, and it is now too late. Our friends on the other side appear to be paralyzed by their fear of the trust power and influence. They cry out in their dismay and ask, Is not the President and the Attorney-General endeavoring to restrain the trusts by an action in the courts?

This is true, but at the same time they know and admit that the present law under which the President is proceeding is not strong enough, and that the relief desired can not come to the people through the one action against the one beef trust. Congress, as I have repeatedly stated, must enact other legislation, but action is not taken. While the masses are crying for relief, the dominant party is overcome with apathy. They are overtaken with a kind of legislative lethargy, and they are content to make the effort to substitute a dose of Executive strenuosity for Congressional ennui.

In other words, they seem to hope that Presidential perseverance will atone for their absence of legislative energy and activity. Measures to control and govern trusts are pending now in the committees of this House, which if reported by the majority, composed of Republicans in every committee, and taken up and passed would afford speedy relief, if supplemented by the second remedy I would suggest—namely, the reforming, revising, and reduction of the rates of duty prescribed in the present tariff laws.

One of the measures of relief to which I refer is a bill introduced by myself into this Congress amendatory of the Sherman antitrust law. This bill is almost identical in its provision to that passed by the House during the last Congress, and which the Republican majority in that Congress refused to enact in the law, although they permitted it to be passed by the House. This bill is H. R. 14947, and is entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' approved July 2, 1890."

As I have already stated, it was believed when this bill was pending before this body, in the last Congress, that if passed it would give relief to the country from the grinding exactions of the trust. We have tendered it again to the majority in this House, and earnestly ask for its consideration and passage at their hands. To the enactment of this or a measure similar in its provision every member on this side of the Chamber stands solemnly committed. We will to-day, and at any hour, give unanimous consent for its passage. Enact this measure into law, and make some reasonable and fair reduction of the rates of duty prescribed in the present tariff law, and I confidently believe no intelligent man would contend that a most effectual check, if not the total suppression of trusts and monopolies, would speedily follow. Beyond all peradventure their power to do evil would be greatly reduced.

The claim is made, however, that the tariff must only be reformed by its friends. Do they not control all the branches of the Government? Their utter failure to reform it shows that the reformation can not be left altogether to its friends. One might as well expect the wolf and the fox to reform themselves and give up their passion for the lamb and the fowl and become respectable and well-behaved denizens of the farm and poultry yard as to expect the ravenous and greedy beneficiaries of high protection to voluntarily surrender any portion of their benefits under the law, or to assist in any reformation of protective rates that reduced their profits.

But I repeat what I stated a little while ago, that it is not necessary to resort to absolute free trade or even to a radical or far-reaching reduction of tariff rates. Time and again during this session of Congress the opportunity has been given the majority party in this House to enact moderate measures that would have afforded immense relief to the country Another one of these relief measures which I had the honor to introduce into this House and which could have been considered on any day of the session that the majority might name is a measure to which I will now call attention.

Even now unanimous consent would be cheerfully given by this side of the House for its consideration. [Applause.] When the opportunity was offered for its consideration in the House, such consideration was refused by the Republican majority. The measure to which I refer is very simple in its provisions, but that it would be effective I believe can not be controverted. That measure provided:

> That when it is shown to the satisfaction of the President and Secretary of the Treasury that articles and commodities are manufactured and controlled or produced in the United States by a trust or trusts, the importation of such articles and commodities from foreign countries shall be free of duty until, in the opinion of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, such manufacture, control, or production shall have ceased.

The proposed measure contained the further provision:

> That when it is shown to the satisfaction of the President and Secretary of the Treasury that any article or commodity which is manufactured in the United States is sold in a foreign country more cheaply than the price at which the same article or commodity is sold in the United States the rate of duty on such article or commodity shall be reduced by the President and Secretary of the Treasury 50 per cent of the present rate, or to such extent as to prevent the continuance of such irregularity and injustice, and remove the indirect tariff bounty which promotes the same.

If it be true, as I have already contended and as has been admitted by many of the beneficiaries of the trusts, that the high protective tariff under which we now live is the mother of trusts, then it can not be denied that if the measures I have mentioned, brief and simple as they are, were placed upon the statute books many of the opportunities that the trusts now avail themselves of to oppress the people and to wring from them exorbitant prices for the absolute necessaries of life would be largely removed if not altogether destroyed.

I can not undertake to mention at this time all the combinations afflicting the body politic, but I do at this point mention one which is among the most unjust and oppressive of all of them. It is the steel trust. This monopoly has become so obnoxious and offensive that even one great leader of the Republicans, Mr. BABCOCK, of Wisconsin, has been constrained by the pressure upon him at home to introduce into this House a measure to give some relief to the people from its exorbitant and iniquitous exactions.

And allow me to inquire when that gentleman, forced as he was to seek some measure of relief, in what direction did he turn? In other words, what relief measure did he propose? Naturally enough, and not strange to say, it was a bill to reduce the tariff on the items of steel and iron and the products thereof as set forth in the metal schedule of the Dingley tariff law. Allow me further to inquire why it is that when a Republican can no longer withstand the pressure upon him by his own people for relief from the burdens imposed unnecessarily upon them by these monopolies and trusts that the answer to that demand, if met at all, is met by an effort to reduce tariff rates?

It must be because they know that the high protective tariff is the cause of the oppression. Their action in all such cases show more conclusively than if admitted in a hundred declarations that they know that the fountain of their woes is the tariff law. When they can not longer persuade or cajole the voter to sit still and be bled by the beneficiaries of high protection, they seek to satisfy them by the introduction of relief measures reducing the tariff, and they too often pretend that they are earnestly supporting such measures while they let them slumber and die in the pigeon holes of their committee rooms, the morgue of many meritorious measures.

The Republican authors of these measures then return to their too-confiding constituents and meekly claim that they did all they could to obtain relief for them; that they presented the proper bills and had them referred to the appropriate committees, but that under the rules of the House they could not get them considered. They do not tell them that they assisted in making the very rules which prevented the consideration of their measures and that they made them for the express purpose of preventing the consideration of such measures. They not only make the rules, but they enforce them against themselves most rigidly, and yet they return to their outraged constituents and appeal to them to be pacified, and tell them fanciful stories to satisfy them that they had done all in their power to pass their relief measures.

The pressure for some relief from the oppressiveness of the high tariff has become great in many portions of the country, and it has not infrequently found vent even in the conventions that nominate Republican candidates for Congress. Some of these conventions have only recently passed resolutions solemly instructing the nominees to support tariff-reform bills.

And yet, I am sorry to say, after accepting these nominations and winning their seats on this floor by a mock support of the platforms and resolutions upon which they were nominated, they utterly and totally disregard their instructions and ante-election promises. And when the opportunity is often given to them to keep and perform their pledges and vote for the measures of relief demanded by their people and their platforms, they straight forget what manner of men they are, and either vote directly against the measures or evade the issue by having them declared out of order when called up by others under the rules of the House.

To demonstrate clearly that I am not exaggerating this matter, or drawing upon my imagination for facts, I will read to the House a resolution adopted in a nominating convention held not long since:

Resolved, That we favor a revision of the tariff without unreasonable delay which will place upon the free list every article and product controlled by any monopoly, and such other articles and products as are beyond the need of protection.

I am sure that there are gentlemen on this floor who, on hearing this resolution read, would promptly say that it came from some Democratic convention and that it meant the disturbance of business and the utter ruin of the country. It is not out of place for me to call attention to the similiarity of this resolution to the relief measures I quoted a little while ago, introduced into this Congress by myself, and which, I said, if enacted into law would greatly benefit the country.

Can it be true that the placing of such an act on the statute books would bring disaster to our business interests. This resolution was unanimously adopted in a Republican convention in the now Republican State of Wisconsin. It was the convention in the district represented on this floor by Mr. JENKINS, who for several years has been an honored member of this House. It was further declared in that convention that the country had outgrown protection and did not now need high protective rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I should like to conclude.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think I could get through in twenty or twenty-five minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I have only got thirty minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Let him have the time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to conclude. The nominee accepted the nomination on the resolution I have read, and we welcome him into the rank of tariff reformers. We know and recognize his great ability, and we shall watch with much interest the display of his talents and ability in behalf of tariff reform and reduction whenever the opportunity is offered, and may we not give expression to the hope and confident belief that he will lend us his aid in making an occasion and an opportunity for such a reform and revision?

This gentleman has a distinguished colleague who entered the ranks of the tariff reformers shortly ahead of him. I allude to the chairman of the Republican national Congressional committee, Mr. BABCOCK. On a former day of this session, while engaged in debate, it gave me pleasure to quote the instructions given to him by nominating conventions in his district. The platform made for him by his constituents was very similar to that made for his colleague, Mr. JENKINS.

But the constituents of Mr. BABCOCK have gone even further, and in order that there might be no mistake or misunderstanding as to their wishes they instructed him to support a certain specific reform measure named by them. It is the measure reforming the metal schedule of the Dingly tariff law and reducing the high rates on all iron and steel products.

This measure the gentleman himself had introduced into the House, and lest he might forget to help it along his confiding constituents thought it necessary to beg him to support it. He introduced the bill into the last as well as into this Congress, but I give away no secret when I announce here and now that the records of this House and of the committee to which the measure was referred, and of which the gentleman is himself a member, utterly fails to show that he has ever been desperate in his efforts to have the bill considered either by the committee or by the House itself.

It is not out of place at this late day of the session for the inquiry to be made of him why he has permitted this great relief measure to sleep so quietly in the committee files. In behalf of the people of his district, for whom I now make the inquiry, let me ask why its rest has been so undisturbed, and why he has shown so much complacency in the contemplation of its deathlike slumber? It is a fact which has been published in the daily press throughout the country that every Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee, in season and out of season, has demanded its consideration.

On April 18 last an opportunity was afforded the House to pass the measure of the gentleman, when it was offered as an amendment to a bill then pending, and which was about to be voted upon. The gentleman from Wisconsin did not then raise his voice in behalf of his own offspring, but hoping that I might have the encouragement and support of that gentleman in an honest effort to pass the measure for which his people were crying and for which they were demanding his efforts, I offered it myself as an amendment to the then pending bill.

No voice came from Wisconsin to help me in my humble efforts to have his pet measure considered. By a timely invoking of the Republican rules of this Republican House by a Republican member my efforts failed, and the people of Wisconsin and other States and communities, overburdened and oppressed by the rates of duty fixed in the metal schedule of the Dingley law, are left to their unhappy fate.

On a former day of this session, when a measure was pending before the House dealing with the revenue laws, efforts were made to enact some of the measures I have mentioned—revising and reducing the tariff rates as now fixed by law—but in every case such efforts failed because the Republican majority voted solidly against every such proposition.

The Democratic party has stood for years as one man urging and demanding the passage of simple measures of relief from tariff taxation. In caucus, and on this floor through its members, authorized to speak for it, it has sought to have considered measures that would reform the customs law, and correct some of its glaring and gross inequalities, but without avail. And now, while we know we can not successfully resist the adjournment of this body, I state here and now that we are not only willing, but anxious to take up at once and consider some of the just and reasonable relief bills I have mentioned, indeed all of them, and we will agree to postpone the day of adjournment until they are finally disposed of.

Let me say, however, the war for tariff reform has reached even higher quarters than those already mentioned by me. The distinguished Speaker of this House has been directly charged in his own State in the public press with "pursuing an opposition and obstruction course in the question of making minor but very desirable readjustments of tariff schedules."

The Speaker was forced to meet this charge, and I hold in my hand a letter written by him on February 6 last to Mr. Funk, who is an ex-speaker of the house of representatives of Iowa, and which letter was published in the papers of that State. In this letter he sets forth his views upon tariff legislation and some other questions. From this published letter—and having been given to the press, it is not out of place to comment upon it here—I quote the following words, namely:

Now, in regard to my position, you have accepted the lies sent out by the press, which is being manipulated in the interest of free trade with Cuba.

Of course I do not know what there was to justify the Speaker in using such strong Democratic language when he made the plain charge that lies on him were being sent out by the press, which he said was being manipulated in the interest of free trade with Cuba. From recent developments it would seem that possibly the Government itself was particeps criminis in this using of the press about that time in the interest of the reduction of tariff rates to Cuba. These developments assuredly acquit the Democratic party, however, of being guilty of sending out the aforesaid lies. But let all that pass.

It appears that the main charge made against the Speaker of this House out in Iowa was that he was opposing and obstructing the revision and reduction of the rates of duty in some of the tariff schedules. Defending himself from that charge, the Speaker, in his letter of reply, used the following language. I quote him in full, that there may be no mistake or misrepresentation as to his position. He says:

> The third proposition is a revision of the tariff. You may not be aware that under the rules of the House we would be able undoubtedly to pass a bill that might touch a very few items, putting some on the free list or reducing, but while under the rules of the House this might be accomplished, the Senate has no such rules, and there it would probably broaden out into a general revision of the tariff. That all of us dread and fear the consequences of. For instance, I think that we could safely make a reduction on the steel schedule, and a very wise reduction, but there are gentlemen in the Senate who say that while they live that can not be done because of the present law enabling them to sell, even at a loss, to take possession of the foreign markets, and that this is a blessing to the laboring men and extends the commerce and power of the United States into the Old World.
> It is not long since the tariff was reduced, and by its friends. Of course conditions are changing year by year, but to say that to reach a few schedules like steel and glass, which I would like to see done, we are warranted in opening up a general revision of tariff laws, I can not see that it is a wise thing to do, and there are very few exceptions in either House of Congress to this view. You know how very emphatically the President pronounced against it in his message to Congress.
> You say that I do not know the feeling and the storm that is brewing. I do not understand the situation, probably, you say.

It may be that there was some statement in the letter of his correspondent, Mr. Funk, that provoked our Speaker to the point of losing his equanimity of temper. I do not know what all of the contents of Mr. Funk's letter were, but from a sentence in the Speaker's reply one can easily see and understand that there was at least one highly significant expression used by Mr. Funk, and we may be justified in the conclusion that this was the real provocation to the Speaker. He said to his correspondent, "You say that I do not know the feeling and the storm that is brewing; that I do not understand the situation, probably," etc.

Was it because the Speaker was informed of the unpleasant fact that this storm was brewing in the great Northwest and elsewhere throughout the land that he apparently forgot himself and gave way to this slight manifestation of temper? It will be seen, however, that in his defense the Speaker confessed that it would be wise to revise and reduce some of the schedules of the tariff law, and he proceeded to enumerate them.

This confession having been made most solemnly, why have we not in wisdom made the revision? This concession of the Speaker that the tariff law should be revised is of the extremest significance and importance. It is exactly the contention made by every gentleman on this side of the Chamber. Then, I repeat, why is it we can have no revision? This inquiry stands unanswered in any satisfactory manner. If any answer at all is vouchsafed and any reason given for nonaction on the part of the majority, then the country has the right to pass judgment upon the answer and the reason assigned and determine whether or not they are satisfactory and sufficient.

The Speaker gives the reason, and it is not out of place for me to examine his reason for a moment. He says "that under the rules of the House of Representatives we would be able, undoubtedly, to pass a bill that might touch a very few items, putting some on the free list or reducing; but while under the rules of the House this might be accomplished, the Senate has no such rule, and there it would probably broaden out into a general revision of the tariff. That all of us dread and fear the consequences of."

And thus it is apparent that no revision can be entered upon, although its wisdom is admitted, for the simple reason that the Senate of the United States can not be trusted to make the revision. If it were not unparliamentary in this presence to utter the words and apply them to our coordinate branch of the Congress, I would say poor old Senate.

Many sins of omission and commission have been laid at thy door, but none, perhaps, so grave and so disparaging as to be told from such a source that you can not be trusted to legislate when legislation is demanded and when wisdom requires it. The reason for nonaction having been given from this high source in the dominant party, by one who is authorized to speak for its action and policy, and by one who by virtue of the exalted position he occupies exerts such a commanding influence, it is proper to ask, Is that reason sufficient? Will the country be content with it?

Why can not the Senate be trusted to legislate upon this subject? It is well known that that body has a Republican majority of about twenty-five members. Is it possible that this Republican majority is not to be trusted to legislate upon the tariff? They are trusted under the Constitution to legislate upon all questions coming before Congress. I deny that the reason given for the failure to make confessedly wise and judicious reductions in tariff rates, so urgently demanded throughout the country, is sufficient.

I deny that it is true. I believe that the Senate can be trusted, and I do not believe the country will be satisfied with the reason assigned. Time will not suffice for me to enumerate and point out while on the floor at this time all the broken platform pledges and promises of the majority party. I will mention, however, with brief comment, only a portion of them.

In the national platform of 1900 they declared that if given power again they would enact legislation that would enable the United States to recover our former place among the trade-carrying fleets of the world. They declared that they recognized the fact that we depended upon the foreign shipping for nine-tenths of our foreign carrying, and that this inflicted great loss to the industry of this country.

And yet, if we ask what they have done to recover our former place in carrying trade to foreign lands, the reply is absolutely nothing. What measure do they propose that will have the effect to restore this trade? No one can tell. Are they themselves agreed in Congress upon any such measure? By no means. When the Democratic party controlled the destinies of this country and wrote its laws American ships did the carrying trade of the world, and her masts and banners whitened every sea and were familiar objects at every trade depot on the globe. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Since the policies of the Republican party have been in force American ships have disappeared from the seas and are almost unknown, and the flag, as the signal of a growing and conquering commerce, has almost disappeared from the ocean. Instead of the flag of trade, and of a broadening and extending commerce, we have grown to worship the flag of war, bloodshed, and even of criminal aggrandizement. I find also in that platform a declaration in favor of home rule, and the early admission to statehood of the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma. Yet they are still Territories, and they have knocked in vain for admission to statehood.

Again they declared in their platform in favor of an isthmian canal, which the Democratic party most earnestly favored. Notwithstanding their declaration, the dominant party so controls the situation as to prevent, up to this date, the passage of any measure providing for such a canal.

They declared in favor of the creation of a department of commerce and industry, to be in charge of a secretary with a seat in the Cabinet. This promise and pledge they have failed to keep and make good.

I shall not discuss the foreign policy of the Republican party for want of time. That policy, I say without reservation, has been one of unredeemed promises, of violation of all of the traditions of our Republic, of the improper, unlawful, and scandalous misappropriation and misuse of public moneys, and, upon the whole, a permanent increase of our annual appropriation and expenditures that is wholly inexcusable and unjustifiable.

The total appropriations for all purposes for the support of the Government in all its branches for the year 1898 amounted to:

1898	$485,002,044.72
1899	893,231,615.55
An increase of over $408,000,000.
1900	674,981,022.29
An increase over that of 1898 of $189,000,000.
1901	710,150,862.88
An increase over that of 1898 of $225,000,000.
1902	730,338,575.99
An increase of $245,000,000.

Thus these four years since the Spanish war show an increase—not total appropriations—over and above the appropriations of 1898 of ten hundred and sixty-seven millions of dollars; more than a billion of dollars of increase! So that if we were to assume that without the Spanish-American war the appropriations would have been about the same, or a reasonable increase, we show that when you take the amount for 1898 there has been an increase in the four years of more than a billion of dollars. And we have no promise that they will grow less.

Mr. Chairman, what have we to show for this immense increase in public expenditures? I will not undertake myself to answer the question, but I shall briefly read to you an answer made by a Republican Senator as to the assets we have accumulated. This is the answer, only slightly changed by me, which he gives for what we have obtained by this colossal increase in our expenditures of more than a billion dollars in four years:

> We repealed the Declaration of Independence. We changed the Monroe doctrine from a doctrine of eternal righteousness and justice, resting on the consent of the governed, to a doctrine of brutal selfishness, looking only to our own advantage. We crushed the only republic in Asia. We made war on the only Christian people in the East. We converted a war of glory to a war of shame. We vulgarized the American flag. We introduced perfidy into the practice of war. We inflicted torture on unarmed men to extort confession. We put children to death. We established reconcentrado camps. We devastated provinces. We baffled the aspirations of a people for liberty.

So says Senator HOAR. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield that time to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a few remarks upon the subject of reform in the civil service, and incidentally I may touch upon some other matters which I think proper for the consideration of Congress at this particular juncture. There are a number of measures in the hands of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service which, if passed, would have a tendency to materially promote the protection of the rights of the veterans of the civil war in the public service—bills that I believe ought to pass. But so far the majority of that committee have not seemed to be disposed to give Congress an opportunity to act upon them, although I trust they will before this session comes to a close.

I do not wish to pose as the special champion of civil-service reform in this House. I was appointed upon the committee having charge of that especial class of legislation without any solicitation upon my part. I believe that a certain responsibility rests upon me, both as a member of the Civil Service Committee and of this House, to inform Congress of any infraction of the laws or rules which might have a tendency to destroy the discipline of the public service in any department of the Government.

I believe there has been a serious violation of the letter and spirit of the laws of the civil service in the summary dismissal of Miss Rebecca J. Taylor from the classified service in the War Department, and I shall not be deterred in what I shall say because the principal actor in this assault upon the integrity of the civil service is the Secretary of War, who, in my judgment, as the head of a great Department, should have guarded it as the very chiefest jewel in his treasury, or because the immediate victim of its violation is an example of American womanhood dependent upon her own labor for her support.

I make no pretense of being a civil-service reformer; in fact, I have but little use for reformers in general, but I am a believer in fair play; that so long as the laws and rules of the civil service remain in force and effect they ought to be observed with absolute impartiality, and that the head of a great department is as much subject to the limitations which those laws and rules prescribe for him as is the humblest woman in the employ of his department. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I also believe that no matter how exalted or how lowly the position which we hold under the Government, yet we are all its servants; that from the highest to the lowest, whether man or woman, we all stand equal before the laws and before the rules.

None of us so high that we are above the control and regulation of the law, and I hope no one so lowly as to be beneath its protection and support. We are all subject to free and open criticism of our actions and policies and the administration of our respective duties. The civil-service law was enacted and the various rules upon that subject were promulgated by different Presidents from Mr. Arthur down to Mr. McKinley, because it was believed to be in the interests of the public service to protect Government employees from unwarranted interference for political advantage or partisan purposes, and especially to protect them in unrestrained freedom of political and religious thought and expression.

All the constructions of the courts, the messages of the Presidents, and the reports of the Commissioners from time to time show this to be the case. In order to make the rights of the employees under the civil service absolutely certain and secure against all possibility of doubt or misconstruction, President McKinley, in 1896, promulgated section 8 of rule 2, which expressly declared that before a person could be discharged by a department chief, the employee was entitled to have the reasons and cause for such discharge stated in writing, to have three days to reply, and to have the reasons and cause for such discharge and the reply made a part of the record.

That rule stands as the law to-day, although on June 4 President Roosevelt approved a somewhat marvelous modification of that rule, but the essential provisions which I have mentioned were not repealed in the order of June 4 and still remain in force and effect. I believe that under President McKinley's rule and the modifications made in it by the rule approved by President Roosevelt, and according to the evidence furnished by the War Department itself, Miss Taylor was illegally discharged from the employment of the Government. What is the history of this case?

On May 27 the Secretary of War directed that Miss Taylor be asked if she acknowledged the authorship of an article criticising the political policy of the Administration in its conduct of affairs in the Philippine Islands, and her attention was invited to section 8, civil-service rule 2, stating that the provisions of that rule provided that she should have three days in which to file her answer, but the provisions of this rule also specifically state that she is entitled to a written statement of what the particular charge alleged against her consists.

In answer to this letter, which was referred to her, she replied on May 28 that no statement of the cause or reasons had been furnished in compliance with the plain provisions of section 8 of rule 2 and therefore she had not been furnished the conditions upon which to base a statement; that when this was done she would be glad to avail herself of the privilege of replying to the same. On May 29 the President approved a civil-service order which attempted to construe that portion of President McKinley's order referring to cause or reasons of dismissal and stating that nothing in the rule should be construed so as to require an examination or any trial or hearing except in the discretion of the officer making the removal.

In fact, this order, which some have thought was issued to confound this woman and to make possible her official decapitation without it being subjected to unseemly trial and consideration, only makes her position more tenable, as it expressly construes what President McKinley's rule only might be construed by inference to mean—that political or religious expressions are not just reasons for dismissal from the classified civil service.

Why is this case so important? Because it raises the question of just how far one surrenders the right of expression of religious or political opinions to the dictation of officers in the Government whom political accidents may have placed in power. The distinguished Senator from Ohio and chairman of the Republican national committee is reported in the public press as stating this question with his usual terseness, boldness, and good sense when, in commenting upon the reported objection of a member of this House to alleged interference of Federal employees in political affairs in the city of Cleveland, Ohio, he declared that the question was just how far one surrenders his citizenship when he takes employment in the service of the United States.

What privilege that you and I enjoy is to be denied to them? I know it has been charged or insinuated that the President has taken especial interest in this case and attempted to modify the rule so far as to deny to this American woman some of the rights or privileges to which she was entitled under President McKinley's order, so that the manner of her taking off might be more expeditious and more certain, but I can not believe that. I would have to change every idea and opinion that I have formed of our President if I was to believe it.

From all I have read of him I have always believed that he stood for the honor and dignity of American manhood, and especially that he was a representative of Western courage and Western ideas. I know that he won fame and fortune and the Presidency because he enlisted a regiment of Western plainsmen and gave to that regiment a name borrowed from the posters of a Western showman—"the Congress of the Rough Riders of the World;" that he rode into the office of governor of New York as a rough rider, and that Western votes and influence nominated him for Vice-President at the Philadelphia convention; and I believe that he must depend upon Western votes and influence if he is nominated for the Presidency in 1904. But Western men do not war upon women. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No man from the country where the real rough riders ride would be guilty of changing the rules of a game in order to win the place or injure the reputation of a woman struggling to honestly maintain herself. I do not believe the President had in mind the case of Miss Taylor when he approved the rule to modify the order of President McKinley. It is repugnant to my ideas of American manhood. I believe the President has been misinformed in this case, if brought to his attention at all, and that when it is brought to him in its true status he will order that this woman shall have justice done her and have every opportunity to defend herself, for the very reason that the charge against her is criticism of himself.

I will not believe that any subordinate in the War Department whom, if he should do so—I should hope, for the honor of American manhood and the American Army, that he should remain forever nameless—would be guilty of attempting to have issued an order that would deny any right to an American woman to which she was entitled prior to the issuance of that order and while she was standing before a great department of this Government asking for justice at its hands.

I have only this much more to say upon this subject: If the civil service is to become, as members upon this floor have frequently charged it with being, a plaything and football for politicians for partisan advantage, we ought to have the courage to strike the whole thing from the statute books and return to the old system of piracy and plunder, and to the doctrine that to the victor belongs the spoils, or else do that thing which in my judgment it is our duty to this Government to do, to enact a law so plain in its provisions that he who runs may read, and make it what President McKinley intended his order to be, a bulwark and shield for defenseless men and women in the employ of this Government against political injustice and oppression. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, while commenting upon the difficulty that I have experienced in this particular case in obtaining information from the War Department, I will submit some remarks upon the tardiness and reluctance with which that Department has furnished the legislative branch of this Government information for its guidance upon questions affecting the public welfare and to which we are justly entitled as representatives of the people. You will remember that at the commencement of this Congress almost the first bill reported to this House was one to fix the tariff rates between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

The bill recommended and indorsed by the Administration fixed the entire Dingley rate of duty and was so passed by this House, but no sooner was the bill passed than we were informed that the War Department had in its possession a recommendation from the Philippine Commission that the rates of duty between this country and the Philippines ought not to exceed 50 per cent of the rates established by the Dingley bill; and this House had the humiliation of having that bill go over to the Senate to be there reduced in part in compliance with that recommendation and returned to us, and we swallowed it down with a consequent loss of prestige and reputation of the House of Representatives with the country. Again, in February last the head of the Army of the United States was quoted in the public press as stating that the war in the Philippine Islands was being conducted with unusual and marked severity and cruelty. Did the War Department give Congress and the country any information upon this subject? No.

It was constantly quoted as denying that there was any foundation for these charges, and rumors were flying thick and fast that the General of the Army was about to be retired because of circulating such a report. Again the Senate of the United States investigates the subject and brings to light that order issued by a general in command of our Army in the island of Samar which has brought the blush of shame to every American that loves the flag and the honor and glory of the Army that fights under it—that order to make a howling wilderness of that fertile island, slay all above 10 years of age—and that order impelled——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I ask five minutes more to conclude my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has fixed the limit of debate, and all the time that now remains is under the control of the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Illinois has thirteen minutes remaining.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield of my thirteen minutes five minutes to the gentleman. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That order, Mr. Chairman, I remember, when it was published in the newspapers, impelled the distinguished gentleman from the great State of Pennsylvania to rise in his seat in this House and denounce in stronger language than I can use any who might be responsible for it, and to express the wish that the brave man at the other end of the avenue, in the White House, should not permit its author to disgrace the uniform of his country for twenty-four hours; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania should wish again, as I understand that up to date that general still wears the colors of his country. [Applause.]

Again only a week or so ago this House considered a request to the War Department asking information as to the expenditures of Governor-General Wood, an officer of the United States Army, acting as governor-general through appointment by the executive department—a coordinate branch of this government—as to his conduct and management of affairs in the island of Cuba during our military occupation. To that request the War Department made answer that this information could serve no good purpose, that there was nothing to tell, and that it was only a matter of salary, and that every expenditure of the War Department in the island of Cuba was entirely proper, and that we would be furnished information in good time.

Yet, what is the spectacle presented to the country? In just about a week following this answer, again the Senate, through an investigating committee, brought to light the astonishing fact that the governor-general of Cuba, an appointee of the President of the United States, responsible to the War Department and through it to the people, a man who has been highly honored by this country and by Congress, had taken over $8,000 of money taxed from the pockets of the people of Cuba and without their consent had placed it in a jackpot along with other thousands furnished by the American sugar trust [applause] and put it in the hands of a notorious promoter of legislation in this country to help in driving through Congress a bill which, in the opinion of a majority of the members of this House, was against the best interests of the American people, because a majority of them refused to support the bill subject to the purposes for which that money was expended, and yet they tell us that this is no infringement by a coordinate branch of this Government upon the dignity and privileges of this House; that this action is perfectly proper if, in the opinion of the War Department, it is in the best interests of the people of Cuba.

Great heavens, Mr. Chairman, no wonder the Democrats of this House are only able to overthrow Republican leadership about once a week if the Administration is to have, or has had, access to all the funds of the island of Cuba in order to promote through this House their Cuban legislation; and according to the same principles and same practices, so far as we can know, they have had all the funds of the insular department of the Philippines to promote and drive through this House their Philippine legislation, if in the opinion of the War Department or these military governors it is in the interest of the people of Cuba or the people of the Philippines. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Where, I ask, do the interests of the people of the United States come in upon these questions? If there is anything that would make me believe the hour of imperialism has struck, it would be because military satraps from conquered colonies are to be permitted to expend the gold taken from their treasuries to promote legislation through the House of Representatives of the United States and to have the members of it sit silent and raise no voice against it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have searched through the history of our country and can find no instance that parallels this in its assault upon the dignity and freedom of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, political prophecies are dangerous, but in my judgment the Republican party has dug its political grave in the islands of the sea, with the War Department as sexton in chief in this dim funereal business. Republicans, the Cuban question has already split your party in twain, and before you are through with it the Philippine question will blow the halves of your party so far apart that after the next Congressional election you will not be able to even find the pieces. The American people are studying these questions in a sober mood to-day.

The great heart of the nation is always right; it always beats for liberty and for justice. Sometimes it sleeps, and for a while the people may lie supine beneath assaults upon the dignity of their representatives, but they only bide their time. For when again they shall arise in their majesty and might, let those who would despoil the honor and reputation of this fair Republic beware, for no power on earth is more resistless, the very lightning of heaven no more swift to strike, no more sure in its aim, than is the judgment and just condemnation of a great and free people when once aroused. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the eight minutes that are remaining to me I desire to say that I want to go on with this bill. I want to ask the members of the House to stay here until I finish it. It is necessary to finish it to-day, because to-morrow the insular bill comes up and runs for something near a week, during which time gentlemen will have full opportunity to talk, no doubt.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say one word before we commence to read the bill. I listened with care for almost an hour and a half to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, the leader on the other side of the House, and after listening to him I am here to confess that on this side of the House, and I rather suspect on that side of the House, the millennium has not yet come. [Laughter.] We are not perfect and we do not claim to be. We pull the wagon and we do the work and you find the fault. You have been at that now for over a generation and still we have pulled along. [Laughter and applause on Republican side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I thought we helped you pass the great Administration measure through this Congress.

Mr. CANNON. I think we will pull it for a generation more, and still you scold. We can not help it. It does you good, and I do not think it hurts us. [Laughter and applause.]

Great God! Think of it. You had full power under Cleveland. You came in power partially, from time to time, but then you had full power. It is recent—from 1893 to 1897. Do you not wish you could blot out the recollection of the manner in which you exercised it? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] And for gall and cheek, with that recent performance, now, when we are doing the best we can—not perfect—meeting every obligation, the country prospering, passed through the war with honor, passed through the war with justice, solving the questions that grew out of that war, and solving them with courage, notwithstanding the criticism and the opposition of gentlemen of your party, still you scold. It is the way of the world. Go on; I do not think you can fool the people.

My friend from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] who has just talked, is young and hopeful. By and by, when, politically speaking, he has tarried at Jericho until his beard has grown, he will not be so optimistic.

Now, in conclusion, let us move on. In a few days let us adjourn this Congress. We have nothing to apologize for. Peace and prosperity abound with us here and everywhere throughout our borders as never before in the history of civilization. Print your speeches, circulate them, go upon the stump. I will take my chance that when the silent ballot drops in November next you will march up to the same old defeat. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of State to have the Great Seal of the United States recut, $1,250.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] alluded a minute ago to the fact that the Democratic party came into power in 1893, and trouble in our Treasury arose. I want to say that we did come into power then, and there and then inherited a deficit in the Treasury from a Republican Administration, President Benjamin Harrison's. Hence the Democrats had to issue bonds under a Democratic Administration and used the very bond plates which Charles Foster, Secretary of the Treasury under President Harrison, had ordered made and were made about ten days before the advent of the Cleveland Administration. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there has been an hour and a half on the other side and less than an hour on this side devoted to politics. We have had our say, and I want to pass this bill, and I am going to ask the committee to stay with me until I do pass it, and in all kindness and courtesy, from this on, I shall make the point of order on any gentleman on either side of the House that does not discuss the amendment that is pending.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, Mr. Chairman, I was not talking "politics." I was talking facts, and nothing but facts, and yet my distinguished friend from Illinois objects. [Applause on Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, I have said all I desired to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAPRON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 13150. An act granting a pension to James B. Mahan.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13204. An act to provide for refunding taxes paid upon legacies and bequests for uses of a religious, charitable, or educational character, for the encouragement of art, etc., under the act of June 13, 1898.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3320) granting an increase of pension to Adelaide G. Hatch, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DEBOE, Mr. BURTON, and Mr. GIBSON as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 13123) are authorized to consider and recommend the inclusion in said bill of necessary appropriations to carry out the several objects authorized in the "act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6178. An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation "Miscellaneous expenses, Fish Commission," for the fiscal year 1900, $28.29.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, after line 7, insert:

"Patapsco River, light station, Maryland: The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to enter into a contract for the construction of said light station within the sums authorized by the acts of August 18, 1894, and June 10, 1902, relating to said light stations."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Territory of Alaska: For salaries of commissioners, at the rate of $1,000 per annum, whose terms of office extended into the fiscal year 1902, $1,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "dollars," in line 23, page 15, the following:

"For reimbursement of Cuban revenues: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the revenues of the island of Cuba for the amount expended in said island by the Secretary of War from the revenues collected by the authorities of the United States during the occupancy of Cuba by the military forces of the United States, to military governor of said island, in excess of the salary of said officer as a brigadier-general in the United States Army, the sum of $25,500."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, with great reluctance and with due respect to the gentleman who offers this amendment,

I am compelled to make a point of order against the amendment. There is no law authorizing it, and it is not germane.

Mr. BARTLETT. I could not hear, Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman said. Did he raise a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman raises a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to hear the gentleman state the point of order. The mere raising of a point of order does not convey any suggestion as to the ground on which it has been raised.

Mr. CANNON. I will state the matter again. First, the amendment is not germane; second, it is not authorized by any law. I might say more, but that is enough.

Mr. BARTLETT. You can say all you desire. I hope you will not feel restrained by anything except parliamentary law and decency.

Mr. CANNON. That is enough.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment is not in violation of any rule of the House, nor does it change existing law. I find that in the last general deficiency bill, to be found in Statutes at Large, volume 31, page 1015, there was inserted just at the end of the appropriations for the Treasury Department the provision I am about to read—and if it was offered as an amendment upon the general deficiency bill and accepted as such, then a similar amendment ought to be in order now upon this bill, which is a general deficiency bill.

Reimbursement of Cuban revenues: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the revenues of Cuba for the amount expended in said island in furnishing information to the Secretary of War, as directed by him, relating to receipts and expenditures in said island heretofore paid from said revenues, $15,786.91.

Further, Mr. Chairman, I beg to say that upon the sundry civil bill at the last session of Congress there was put an amendment authorizing the payment to the Cuban treasury out of the Treasury of the United States of the amount that Rathbone, Neely, and Reeves, the post-office officials appointed by the United States in Cuba, had stolen from the Cuban treasury, but the amendment was lost in conference. I have looked that matter up.

So that this House has on at least one occasion, the occasion I have recited, when the general deficiency bill was under consideration during the last session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, and also upon the sundry civil bill in March, 1901, inserted in the one case a provision which was enacted into law similar to that which I now offer to this bill, and in another case adopted a similar provision which failed in conference.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we are here making sundry appropriations to meet deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government, and this proposition of mine is in line with one which the House thought proper to put upon the last general deficiency bill and which became a law, and with another which the House thought proper to put upon the sundry civil bill but which failed in conference.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Illinois or any other member of Congress ought to rise in his place and object to this amendment upon a mere technicality, when it is an effort to induce Congress to restore to the treasury of the Cuban people, who have just struggled into national existence—whose independence we have aided in securing—money that has been illegitimately, illegally, and in violation of law taken by our Army officers while we occupied that island by our military forces.

Mr. CANNON. I must raise the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the matter before the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am undertaking to do so; and if the Chair will say that I am not, I will yield to the decision with great pleasure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must request the gentleman to confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that in suggesting to the Chair the reasons why this amendment is in order I may have digressed. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Oh, gentlemen, I do not doubt that you desire to laugh this matter down, but it will not be laughed down. You have got to face it sooner or later, and you might as well face it now.

In the cases I have cited payments out of the Cuban treasury by American officers for purposes of our own have been repaid by appropriations upon the general deficiency bill.

I cite—and the gentleman from Illinois will not deny it, I apprehend—that upon the last general deficiency bill an appropriation, to which I call the attention of the House, of $15,786.91 was incorporated in the bill to pay back to the treasury of the Cuban people the amount which had been expended by our officials over there in furnishing to the Secretary of War information relative to receipts and expenditures in that island.

Now, if it were in place upon the last general deficiency bill—and I propose to put it on this general deficiency bill—of course I suggest that it is in order here. What law does it violate, Mr. Chairman? If we pay our debts, if we return to the Cuban treasury the amount that we have either legitimately or illegitimately paid out of that treasury for our own purposes, it will create a deficiency, and if the Secretary of the Treasury, in the administration of the affairs of those people by our military forces and our military governor and the other officers over there, has taken out of the treasury of these people moneys to be used for some object which may or may not be legitimate, then the United States is indebted to the Cuban people and to their treasury to the amount thus expended. And does it take any law for this Government to comply with its obligations in that regard?

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is no law which prohibits this amendment upon this bill in this place. I beg again to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that a like appropriation for like expenditures of money from the treasury of the Cuban people was placed in the last general deficiency bill, and I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] not to make the point of order, even if he believes it is proper to be sustained, because if we have taken the money of these people and paid it over to our officers, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois rises to a question of order.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have said all that I desire on the point of order, and I commend to the gentleman and to the country this continued effort on the part of that side of the House to smother all investigation of our dealings with the people of Cuba.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The mere fact that a similar item was contained in some former appropriation bill does not, of course, make in order any particular item.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws the amendment, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter no act of Congress shall be construed to make an appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States unless such act shall, in specific terms, declare an appropriation to be made for the purpose or purposes specified in the act.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve all points of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia reserves the point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. I would like to hear some explanation from the gentleman from Illinois as to what that means.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will state that it was put in there—and I will say to the gentleman that I think it is subject to the point of order—with the consent of the full committee reporting it to the House. The committee believes it to be good policy that the Congress should know when it made legislation making appropriations, and that they should be specifically made, not by construction of some accounting officer who has the last guess, and who, in my judgment, frequently errs in his guess as to whether words make an appropriation or not, but, as I say, specifically made. It is to enable the Congress, if it should be written into the law, to keep track of the appropriations and expenditures, leaving nothing to the construction. It is the desire of the committee that not a dollar shall be taken from the Treasury unless it be expressly appropriated.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to my colleague that it follows almost the language of the Constitution, and therefore it can not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to ask the gentleman if the acts of Congress have been abused or misconstrued so as to grant appropriations where none was intended?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I do not want to unnecessarily criticise anybody, but there have been some acts of Congress construed as appropriating money which I do not believe Congress intended to appropriate.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to say to the gentleman that if this paragraph is to serve any good purpose, I have no objection. I simply wanted an explanation of it, as I did not understand it. If the committee is unanimous in its opinion that this is a good law, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to my colleague that this can not serve any bad purpose, and we thought when we put it there it would serve a very good purpose.

Mr. MADDOX. I am inclined to think so, from the gentleman's explanation. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the Southern Branch at Hampton, Va.: For subsistence, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act, and for the fiscal year 1902, $10,000.

For household expenses, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1902, $6,000.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 26, after line 21, insert:

"Marion Branch, at Marion, Ind.: For quartermaster and commissary storehouse and repairing old storehouse and constructing fireproof vaults therein for offices, $30,000."

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to know whether there is any law authorizing this? If there is not, I reserve the point of order. I should like to hear the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BARTLETT. I reserve the point of order that there is no law authorizing this.

Mr. STEELE. There is a law authorizing the construction of all these Homes. This item was estimated for, but by an oversight was not sent to the committee in time to be inserted in the appropriation bill. There are no fireproof vaults there at all, and there are not adequate offices for the quartermaster and commissary, offices which have been created by law. These buildings are necessary for the public service to preserve the public records, and are estimated for.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I think I can make it plain. The gentleman called my attention to this matter before he offered it. I have no doubt that under the law the amendment is free from the point of order. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] is a member of the Board of Managers, and assures me that this appropriation is necessary for the service of this Home. For that reason I do not object to it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Has the gentleman any knowledge of any estimate properly sent up by the Department for this amount of money?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Indiana assured me that the estimate had been made by the board.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. By the board?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But does it come from the Treasury Department?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether it be a formal, legal estimate or not, but the estimate is not what gives the jurisdiction.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to know whether the appropriation is necessary. If it is, it should be made. I am not discussing the point of order. I want to know whether the money is necessary. We can only know from a proper estimate.

Mr. STEELE. This is in amount less than has been asked for any other Homes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That may be true, but do they need the money?

Mr. STEELE. They need the money.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Can you tell the House why they need it?

Mr. STEELE. They need it for the construction of these buildings that have been estimated for.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois what law there is authorizing these repairs and these new buildings?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the law establishing the Branch Home at Marion, Ind.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then it comes under the rule that it is a continuing improvement?

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt on earth that the law authorizes it, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. I make the point of order that there is no law authorizing this. Let the Chair decide it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know whether there is now a quartermaster's department at Marion?

Mr. STEELE. There is.

The CHAIRMAN. Where there are at present other buildings?

Mr. STEELE. At present the building that is used is entirely inadequate, and there are no quarters for the officers. It is intended to take the old building and convert it into officers' quarters and construct the necessary vaults therein to protect the public property, and to have a storehouse for storing quartermaster stores and commissary stores in that building.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the prior appropriation was a limited one, then this appropriation is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. What the Chair desires to know is whether there is a plant there now for which this appropriation provides simply an enlargement and extension?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In addition to that, I want to suggest that the former appropriation was a limited one, and that if so it requires legislation to extend it. If that is true, then the point of order is good against this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What the Chair desires to know is as to whether or not this case is on all fours, for instance, with the Naval Academy proposition, where the appropriation was held to be in order by the present occupant of the chair, out of deference, as he stated at the time, to prior decisions?

Mr. CANNON. The fact about it is this: Some time ago a law of Congress was enacted authorizing the construction of a Branch Home at Marion, Ind. The Home has been constructed, is occupied, has barracks, hospitals, and so forth, and so forth. Now, then, at this place no limitation was placed on the Branch Home at Marion whatever. This is to build an additional building as specified in the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question before the Chair rules? How can a proposition of this kind be in order on a deficiency bill? How do you get this on a deficiency bill? How is it germane on a deficiency bill?

Mr. CANNON. It is a general appropriation bill. The rule does not define what exact amendments shall go upon it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Just the will of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. The will of the majority of the House, under the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair held in a former Congress in reference to Annapolis Academy that an amendment providing for an additional building there was in order. The Chair stated at the time that he so held in deference to former decisions, not because he would have so held had it originally come before the present occupant of the chair. If there was no other question involved now than the question of the enlargement of the plant, the necessary enlargement, the Chair would be inclined to hold that it was in order, following the precedent established in the Naval Academy case and the cases upon which it was based. But the Chair is inclined to think that the suggestion and point made by the gentleman from Georgia, that it is not in order on a general deficiency bill, is well taken.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I trust the Chair will not make that ruling without examination, because it has been held the other way frequently. The gentleman from New York held the other way on a former occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will see if he can find authority directly upon that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would like to suggest, for the benefit of the Chair, that if an increase of salary was attempted in this bill the point of order would lie against it.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; if it was against the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate to the Chair when the ruling was made to which he referred a moment ago? The Chair does not find it in the Digest.

Mr. CANNON. I am informed that in the last Congress, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in the chair, that ruling was made. But it is not necessary, if the Chair will indulge me for a single suggestion. If the Chair will take this bill, "A bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes"—now, then, if the Chair will examine the rule of the House that gives jurisdiction to the committee I think the Chair will not find anything that says exactly what shall go in the deficiency bill or upon the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I may say to the Chair that the title of the bill settles the question—"making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1902." This appropriation is not a deficiency; it is not to be expended in 1902, as the gentleman from Illinois himself knows.

Mr. CANNON. And yet my friend stops and omits the words "and for prior years, and for other purposes." That is like unto the man who said he could prove by the Bible there is no God. "Well, prove it." 'Well," he says, "there is no God," and showed it in black and white. "Why," says his friend, "confound you; you have left out the first half of the sentence: 'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.'" [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman is playing upon words, I wish to say for his information that we have here the general expression "for deficiencies for the fiscal year." I do not care what the purpose is, it is absolutely to pay the expenses for this fiscal year.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to two decisions. I do not know whether they will add any force to what I have already said. I refer to page 455 of the Manual, the cases found on pages 2713 and 2716 of the RECORD, second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The payment of an unadjudicated claim, even if the amount be ascertained and transmitted by the head of an executive department, is not in order on a deficiency bill.

Now it might be good, but not on a general deficiency bill. Here is a claim against the Government transmitted; and if it had got votes enough it might have been appropriated for, but in that case they held that although transmitted it was not in order, because that was a deficiency bill. The following paragraph upon the same page of the Manual declares:

It is not in order to appropriate on the deficiency bill for an unadjudicated claim, even though it be transmitted to the House by an executive message.

Now, there is no law authorizing this. It is simply a construction of the law by reason of the fact that a building has been authorized that they can go on and extend it. It occurs to me that it is not in order upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair may suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, it seems to him that in the preservation of harmony between the bills that this item in all fairness ought to be on the sundry civil bill and not on the general deficiency bill. The Chair is unable to find any ruling which holds one way or the other upon the proposition.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That has to be done by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think there ought to be a ruling,

Mr. CANNON. I will say, so far as the ruling is concerned, I do not accept the ruling, notwithstanding the precedent cited for the ruling, and I think on a thorough discussion and a full examination of the authorities the amendment is in order; but as the gentleman is quite content to withdraw his amendment, I think probably that it may best go that way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The ruling of the Chair is that it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the last point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

The repeal of the supplementary acts amendatory of the act of March 3, 1899, enumerated in section 12 of the act of March 6, 1902, entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," shall not be construed to take effect until the termination of the temporary organization of the office as provided in the last-named act: And provided further, That the disbursing clerk of the Census Office may pay out of the census fund on June 30, 1902, to employees of the office who are not to be reappointed on July 1, for whatever leave of absence the Director of the Census may, in his discretion, allow them, not to exceed, however, the annual leave authorized by existing law; such payment to be in addition to the salary due them for services rendered to that date.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, upon that I reserve a point of order as to the latter part of that section.

Mr. CANNON. It is clearly subject to a point of order, but I apprehend that my friend, when he understands it, will not make it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia reserve his point of order?

Mr. MADDOX. I do.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Georgia knows that a large number of clerks are going out of service on the 30th day of June at the Census Office. Now, many of them go out without having had their leave of absence which they have earned, and this is to enable the Director of the Census to pay them for the leave of absence which they have earned when they go out, and it can not exceed fifteen days.

Mr. MADDOX. Let me ask the gentleman. A number of employees have been discharged from time to time recently, and my understanding is that they have been allowed no leave of absence or even notice, but simply called up to the desk and paid off and discharged. Why is it, now, that these clerks who are to be discharged on the 30th are to be given leave of absence and paid for it, too?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. With the permission of the chairman of the committee, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that prior to January 1 they had all received their allowance, and wherever they did not take it they were paid for it. This is for the fiscal year, and every single person that has been discharged has had credit for a leave of absence—three days, ten days, or whatever amount it was. Now, then, on June 30, when the temporary organization ceases to exist and the permanent force comes into life, this simply authorizes the Director to do just what he has been doing—to give the people who have not been employed permanently their pro rata share of the annual leave. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not object, for it is fair, right, and just that these clerks should have it. Those that have been turned out have had it, and those who are left ought to have it.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to ask the chairman of the committee again a question. What I am after is that these employees should all be treated alike and be treated fairly. Is it a fact that these men, who have been discharged from time to time recently, have enjoyed heretofore the leave of absence and been paid therefor?

Mr. CANNON. I am informed by gentlemen sitting around me that they have.

Mr. MADDOX. That is the reason they were not allowed leave of absence and paid?

Mr. CANNON. No; I understand they have had their leave of absence. Those that have been discharged have been allowed the leave of absence or paid for it if they have earned it. The gentleman will see at once that those who serve up to June 30 and go out of service entirely could not be granted a leave of absence. Those who went out on the 1st of June could be granted a leave, and, as I am informed, they have been granted ten days or fifteen days or whatever amount was due them. When they were discharged they were granted leave of absence equivalent to the number of days that was due them and paid for that number of days.

Mr. MADDOX. They are entitled under the law to thirty days in a year, and it is proposed in this bill to pay them for the thirty days that they would be entitled to.

Mr. CANNON. The proportion that they are entitled to.

Mr. MADDOX. That is exactly what I wanted to get at. I wanted to find out whether the employees were all being treated exactly alike and being treated fairly and honestly.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. MADDOX. If they are, then I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws his point of order.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Salaries and expenses, United States courts, Indian Territory: For the payment of the salaries of the clerk, commissioner, and constables authorized by the act approved May 27, 1902, during the fiscal year 1903, and of the commissioners and constables authorized by this act, $16,200: Provided, That the judge for the western district of the Indian Territory shall be authorized and required to appoint two additional United States commissioners for said district and a constable for each of said commissioners; and the judge for the northern district of said Territory shall be authorized and required to appoint two additional United States commissioners for said district and a constable for each of said commissioners. Said commissioners and constables shall be located at places designated by said judges, respectively: Provided, That each of such judges may, in his discretion, require any commissioner appointed for his district whose headquarters are not permanently fixed by law to hold terms of court at more than one place, and in that case he shall fix the places and times of holding such terms and the length of each term. All laws applicable to the salaries, duties, powers, and responsibilities of other United States commissioners and constables in the Indian Territory shall be applicable to the commissioners and constables appointed under the provisions of this act. This proviso shall be in force from and after July 1, 1902.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, page 57, after the word "appoint," strike out the word "two" and insert "three;" and in line 12, page 57, after the word "appoint," strike out the word "two" and insert the word "three."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment which I wish to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 15, page 57, after the word "at," strike out "places designated by said judges, respectively," and insert "Sapulpa, Okmulgee, and Waggoner in the western district, and Miami, Nowata, and Pryor Creek in the northern district."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I hope that amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I promised and intended to press this amendment, and to keep my pledge I have presented it. I now withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws his amendment. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Herman Gauss, for services as assistant clerk, by detail, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, $750.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Amend by adding at the end of line 18, page 13, the words:

And to pay the difference between the salary of said messenger and $2,000 per annum from December 1, 1901, to July 1, 1902, $650.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDOX. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to explain what is meant in the paragraph just read by the word "detail." Where was this man detailed from?

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt he was detailed from the Pension Office, and this paragraph has been inserted, I will say, by virtue of the following authority:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations is hereby authorized to provide in the general appropriation bill for the payment to Herman Gauss of $750 for extra services rendered to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.
Attest:

A. McDOWELL, Clerk.

It will thus be seen that this has been put on by direction of the House.

Mr. MADDOX. Is that one of those resolutions that came from the Committee on Accounts and were passed by the House?

Mr. CANNON. I understand so. I have no doubt that is the case, because this is certified to the committee as being the action of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will say that that is correct. I have here the RECORD for May 28 of last year, page 6430.

Mr. MADDOX. I simply wanted to understand what was meant by "detail." I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the four conductors of the elevators in the House wing of the Capitol the difference between the amounts received by them and the rate of $1,200 per annum for the fiscal years 1901 and 1902, $200 each; in all, $800.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 65, after line 2, insert the following:
"To pay the conductors of the elevator in the House wing of the old library space of the Capitol the difference between the amounts received by them and the rate of $1,200 per annum from March 5, 1901, to June 30, 1902, inclusive, as follows: R. E. Walker, $132.49; J. C. Duncan, $132.49; in all, $264.98.
"To pay John Douglas, for services as laborer in the Doorkeeper's department during the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, $116."

Mr. Chairman, in explanation of this amendment I will say that I hold in my hand certified copies of resolutions of the House.

Mr. MADDOX. They have been passed on heretofore.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the same as in the other case.

Mr. MADDOX. How do they differ from the paragraph providing in general terms for conductors of the elevator without mentioning names?

Mr. CANNON. This is for the conductors of the elevator in the House wing of the old library space.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after line 2, on page 65, the following words:
"To pay Albert Scott, for services as laborer for eighteen days, from December 2, 1901, to December 19, 1901, $36."

Mr. CANNON. I shall have to reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the committee that this colored boy, Albert Scott, was on the roll as a laborer in the last Congress and performed duty as such. When this Congress assembled, having been on the roll during the last Congress as a laborer, he commenced work in the same capacity the day Congress met—the 2d day of December. He did his work faithfully until the 19th day of that month, when a resolution drawn by myself was adopted by the House putting him upon the roll at $50 a month. In drawing that resolution I undertook to frame it so that it would pay him from the day Congress met, the day when he went to work, until the 19th, when the resolution placing him on the roll was adopted. It seems that the resolution as I drew it was not effectual to cover that period of time from the 2d to the 19th of the month. The Comptroller held that the resolution which we passed would be operative only from the day of its adoption, although this colored boy had been at work for 18 days previous.

This amendment of mine may be subject to a point of order. I have not introduced and sent to the Committee on Accounts a resolution for the purpose of paying this man the pitiful sum of $36. If, after this statement, the gentleman from Illinois, or any other gentleman, thinks that this poor colored boy ought not to be paid I am content to let the matter pass.

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt he ought to be paid. But my friend from Tennessee, I presume, realizes the condition touching these payments. The Committee on Appropriations adopted a rule for this session and the future that it would relieve itself of the great pressure that has heretofore come to us constantly, to put on these appropriation bills provisions for extra pay; and we gave notice to the Committee on Accounts——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is not a proposition for extra pay.

Mr. CANNON. Well, additional pay.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is not additional pay. If I had drawn the resolution so as to accomplish what I had intended, it would have passed the House, and those eighteen days would have been covered. But it seems that the resolution as drawn by me was not effectual in the opinion of the Comptroller. I still think that the resolution provided for the pay of this man from the 2d day of December; but the Comptroller has held otherwise.

Now, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman from Illinois; I do not want to violate any rule that he and his committee have adopted, but in view of the fact that the amount involved is only $36 for this poor colored boy, and in view of the statement I have made, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the amendment be agreed to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compiling, under the direction of the House Committee on Printing, of the constitutions, with all amendments thereto, and of the organic acts and enabling acts of the several States and Territories of the United States, $2,000.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 65, line 4, strike out the word "Printing" and insert the word "Judiciary;" and in line 6 strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after line 7, page 65, the following:
"To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and the House, borne on the annual and session rolls on the 1st day of June, 1902, including the Capitol police, the official reporters of the Senate and of the House, and W. A. Smith, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk, for extra services during the Fifty-seventh Congress, a sum equal to one month's pay at the compensation then paid them by law, the same to be immediately available."

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withhold his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia reserves the point of order.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that this may be subject to the point of order, but, in my judgment, it should hardly be made. This matter has been retained in the deficiency bill for many years, and is properly classed as an appropriation, because it has been running on for so long a time that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. It has become the law and the precedent of the House more in the nature of an appropriation than of any new legislation, and beyond that, we have already in this act appropriated and voted money for certain employees of this House who perhaps are no more entitled to it than those who are provided for in this resolution, and the gentleman from Georgia inquired of the chairman of this committee but a few moments ago, when he raised a point of order, as to whether the sum appropriated provided equally for all of them, and upon the chairman's reply that it did, he then withdrew his point of order. I want to say now to the gentleman from Georgia that this also appropriates equally to all employees, and I hope the gentleman will not press his point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. Whom have we provided for in this bill?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Some employees of the Census Bureau. We have provided for the elevator men. We have provided for persons who have been attendant on this House.

Mr. MADDOX. Extra pay?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Extra allowance.

Mr. MADDOX. There is nothing here, as I understand it, except that which has been passed by resolution of this House.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not understand that those in the Census Bureau were passed by resolution of the House. Were they—I would inquire of the chairman of the committee, Mr. CANNON?

Mr. CANNON. No; the House took no action.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. This gives to all equally and alike, and I hope the gentleman will not press his point of order.

Mr. CANNON. They were not employed by the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman if these employees are to remain a month after Congress adjourns? Wherein does the extra pay come in?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. This is simply an extra compensation for them for the work that they do. It has been in every deficiency bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That they have been doing or that they will do?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. That they have been doing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The reason that I interrupted the gentleman was this: I know a lot of these laborers and employees have to stay here a long time after Congress adjourns and work, and I myself have returned nearly a month after Congress adjourned, and when I have come back I have found them working here at that time, and certainly a man ought to be paid for that kind of work.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. This is pay for that kind of work.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, then, they ought to be paid because they do the work.

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman says they ought to be paid for that kind of work if they stay here for thirty days. He is probably not aware of the fact that they are paid by the year, and that they will go home, probably, and stay six months, when they do nothing at all, and next year there will be nine months when they will not even strike a lick.

Now, I want to tell you what I think about this business. I have nothing against these employees, that is, some of them, to say the least of it. My judgment, however, is that we have three times as many employees as we need in this House right now. Probably I may be a little extravagant in that statement, but I will say that we have twice as many as we need.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I do not believe the gentleman wishes to make a misstatement, and I desire to say to him that these employees are not all paid annually. Some of them are monthly employees for the session only.

Mr. MADDOX. This resolution covers all of them. It makes no distinction. Probably if it applied only to the session employees——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MADDOX. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was not aware of the fact that they were employed by the year. I thought they were employed by the month, and if they remain here and work an extra month or an extra day, I think they ought to be paid for it.

Mr. MADDOX. It is not extra work nor an extra day. I want to state to this House that just before the adjournment at the last session we had something of a scandal in relation to extra pay for these employees of this House. The House passed a resolution to investigate these matters, and appointed a committee for that purpose. That committee reported to the House. The result of that report was that the Appropriations Committee undertook to pass a law by which they regulated the salary to be paid to each and every employee of this House. It was then understood that we were to have no more pay for extra services. Now, what is the extra month for except extra compensation? What does it mean? It means nothing else.

Now, do you want simply to make a present to these employees? My friend over there [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER] says that we have just provided an appropriation for the Census employees and that we ought to be fair. Those Census employees, as I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, are entitled to thirty days leave of absence within twelve months, and it is the intention of these gentlemen to pay them for that leave, whatever it may be. If they have only seven days or five days or six days, they are to be paid for that.

Now, what is the condition with reference to the House employees? If we adjourn in a few days, they have from now until next December leave of absence, and after next March they will have until the following December leave of absence. The Census employees and the other employees in the departments have no such leave; and I take it for granted that these employees in the Census Department and other places work eight hours a day. I will guarantee that there are seventy-five or a hundred men in this House, now employed by the Government, who do not work an hour a day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this much. I shall not assume the responsibility in this House to say, if you want to make to these gentleman a present of this extra month, that you can not do so. The responsibility is upon the party on that side of the House for the payment and expenditure of this money. I saw proper to reserve this point of order.

You appointed a committee. That committee was to be continued to investigate the employees of this House and to report thereon. That committee has had one meeting, in which it decided to adjourn subject to the call of the chairman. In other words, the committee decided to watch the operation of the law that had been passed to see what effect it would have. Up to this time we have had no other meeting.

In one sense the responsibility is upon that committee. I now put the gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee on notice that I have reserved the point of order. The responsibility is on you for the expenditure of this money. You can insist upon the point of order, if you want to. I shall not do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, just a single word. I did not make the point of order and I shall not make it, because the practice has been so long followed, and points of order have been so frequently overruled, that it is evidently the will of the House from year to year to give this extra month's salary, so that in point of fact it may be regarded as a part and parcel of the pay of the employees of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Refunding to States expenses incurred in raising volunteers as follows:

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make the point of order to the rest of the items on this page, and I want to know whether I shall wait until it is read or make it now?

The CHAIRMAN. It can be made when the section is read.

Mr. SIMS. I want to make it as to each paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask unanimous consent that from line 11, on page 71, to and including line 24, of page 71, as they are on all fours, that they be read to that point, and that the gentleman may make his point of order to all of them.

Mr. SIMS. That is what I want.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SIMS. Further, in case the point of order is not sustained, I wish to move to amend each of these items.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent also as to that effect.

Mr. SIMS. That is satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that amendments may be offered to any line in the paragraph.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; that I may offer an amendment to each paragraph.

Mr. OLMSTED. One moment. Does that apply to the amendment of the gentleman only?

Mr. CANNON. To anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the State of Indiana, $635,859.20
To the State of Iowa, $456,417.89.
To the State of Michigan, $382,167.62.
To the State of Ohio, $458,559.35.
To the State of Illinois, $1,005,129.29.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order as to each of these appropriations, that they are not germane to this bill, being a deficiency bill. Each one is an original appropriation, and each of them should properly be referred by bills to the Committee on War Claims, and there are claims for each of these items before that committee undetermined. That is the point of order I wish to make—that they are not deficiency items, and that they are not properly on the deficiency bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the point of order is not well taken. These are audited accounts for the payment of certain moneys that are due to certain States under the legislation of 1861 and 1862, and under additional legislation which I will read. Legislation approved February 14, 1902:

And the claims of like character.

That is, the items preceding. It was to refund to the States moneys that were expended by the States under the act of 1861, in furnishing troops and clothing them, etc., with which the Chair is no doubt familiar. We appropriated for these items to the State of Pennsylvania, Maine, Rhode Island, and the following legislation is found:

And claims of like character arising under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat., p. 276), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stat., p. 615), as interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the State of New York against the United States, decided January 6, 1896 (160 U. S. Reports, p. 598), not heretofore allowed or heretofore disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be reopened, examined, and allowed, and if deemed necessary shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determination of disputed questions of law to aid in the settlement of the claims by the accounting officers.

And then we have the act of 1862 for furnishing the troops and clothing them under that legislation. Then the act of last February, the reopening of the accounts, auditing the claims by the Auditor of the Treasury Department, as provided for in the law, and the certification of the claims as audited claims by the accounting officers of the Treasury, which I have before me, properly certified to Congress, referred by the Speaker to the committee, and now reported upon the deficiency bill as usual in all audited accounts. It seems to me it is not subject to any point of order; if so, every other audited account is subject to the point of order, and could not go upon this bill or any other bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, there is some objection on this side of the House to these claims, and for that reason I suppose my friend from Tennessee made the point of order. I state this simply to show reason, if the point of order is insisted on. As I understand, these are claims of States for money that they paid out to arm the troops during the war, and some of the States have been paid. For instance, New York has been fully paid. New York and the other States up to this time that have been paid have been paid for money that they expended and the interest thereon up to the date of payment. Now, in some of these States that we are appropriating for in this bill I understand that the State borrowed the money and issued bonds and the bonds are not matured.

Now, instead of taking the money out of their State treasury and levying the taxes on their people for that purpose they preferred to borrow it, and instead of borrowing it for a short time they borrowed it for a long time. Now, this appropriation, as I understand it, is not only to pay these States back the money that they have paid out and the interest up to the present day, as we would do any other creditor, but is to pay——

Mr. BINGHAM. That is wrong.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is in error. But I want to suggest to my friend that he is upon the merits of the matter and that a point of order is pending. I think there can be no doubt but what the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not agree with the gentleman. I think the point of order is well taken, and I am coming to that right now, if the House will allow me a moment. As I understand the proposition—of course that is a question open for discussion—more is being paid to these States than they have paid.

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary—we want to get at the very facts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Exactly the same measure has been paid under this auditing to these States that was paid to the State of New York by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, from the information that I have, I will say that it is otherwise. When we come to the case on the floor, the gentleman may convince me that I am wrong. If I am convinced, I will have no objection to the States being paid what is actually due. But on the point of order these cases were all sent to the Court of Claims, like the Southern war claims, and like other claims where other cases are sent to the Court of Claims. For what purpose?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman is mistaken. These claims have not been sent to the Court of Claims at all. They are claims that were audited, and from the audit an appeal was taken to the Comptroller, properly decided by the Comptroller, and certified to Congress for appropriation. They have never been to the Court of Claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did not the law authorize them to go there?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They could have been sent there if there had been any question as to the facts, but there was no question as to the facts. They are not on all fours with the cases the gentleman mentions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am answering the gentleman from Illinois when he says that these cases stand on the proposition that the cases were ordered by Congress to go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. LACEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me finish my sentence. It puts them in no better attitude than any other claim that was sent to the Court of Claims. If they stand on that basis, Mr. Chairman, then they ought to fall on the same procedure, under the parliamentary law of this House, as any other case does that has been referred to the Court of Claims and comes back here for settlement.

Mr. LACEY. If it be true that the Supreme Court of the United States has held these claims to be valid and legitimate claims against the Government under existing law, then the payment is certainly authorized by existing law, and consequently the point of order is not well taken. Is not that correct?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; that has nothing to do with the point of order. What we are striking at is whether the claims are germane to this bill. I do not mean to say that these claims are not germane to something and that some money ought not to be paid to these States. I am not arguing that point. What I contend is this, Mr. Chairman, that if you take it from the standpoint that they have a standing here because they are authorized by law to go to the Court of Claims, then, to follow the procedure followed in all other cases where a judgment from the Court of Claims comes back, it should go to a war claims committee. But if, on the other hand, these cases stand in a position contended for by the gentleman from Indiana that they have been audited, they are not judgments of any court, there is no court here that has ever rendered judgment and certified these cases to the Appropriation Committee. If they stand here on a basis or law by which they were authorized to be audited, I say they have no standing on the general deficiency bill; that the proper place for claims of that kind would be on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, we have the order of the House determining the status of these very claims, because bills have been introduced for their payment, and these bills have been referred by the Speaker of the House to the Committee on War Claims. Now, one of the very first propositions that you consider when you go to determine whether a matter is germane or not is what committee it has gone to—what committee has jurisdiction of it. In other words, certainly a matter that would not go to the Appropriation Committee would not be germane to a bill reported to this House from the Appropriations Committee.

The Speaker of this House has determined that question by referring these individual bills to the Committee on War Claims, and not to the Committee on Appropriations. So, thus far, we have a determination that they are not germane. But, if the Committee on Appropriations has any jurisdiction of this matter at all, it certainly only has it on the sundry civil bill, which is intended to carry appropriations of this kind. The deficiency bill is clearly and manifestly a bill for paying claims or deficiencies where Congress, in the original appropriation, fails to appropriate enough money to carry out the original appropriation as carried in some other bill. Now, these claims have no relation to any other matter, because this is the first time Congress has attempted to appropriate in the matter. There is no deficiency existing in reference to these claims, and therefore, necessarily, they are not germane upon a deficiency bill.

I know it has been customary as a matter of unanimous consent to carry a vast number of appropriations of various descriptions on the general deficiency bill. As a matter of fact, this bill itself contains provisions that have gone through here by unanimous consent that would have been defeated if a point of order had been made against them. All the great appropriation bills often carry matters of that kind. But because there are matters carried on these bills which are not germane, that does not warrant anyone in holding that these original appropriations are germane to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have been desirous to avoid making any statement which might appear to bear upon the merits of the amendment, but it is necessary for me to refer briefly to some circumstances of the present case in order to get at the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the gentleman will let the Chair determine the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to make simply a short statement in order to get at the point of order.

The legislation under which these claims have been certified was put on the urgent deficiency bill, which was itself subject to a point of order at that time. The four claims provided for upon the urgent deficiency bill were the claims of Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, and Maine. Each of those claims had been presented to the Court of Claims, and the court had made a finding. Now, immediately follows this legislation authorizing the accounting officer to audit these claims regardless of the limitations which had been imposed in a former settlement of like claims.

The claims carried in this appropriation were before the Committee on War Claims, of which I am a member. I had an opportunity to investigate the question, and I would have made a point of order against this legislation had I not thought that the settlement of these claims would follow the decision of the Court of Claims. The claim of the State of New York was settled under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; the claims of these four States were settled under a decision of the Court of Claims upon cases referred to that court by the very Comptroller who has passed on this claim, and they were audited in pursuance of the decision of the Court of Claims. But when we come to the case of the State of Indiana the Comptroller does not follow the decision of the Court of Claims or of the Supreme Court, as I contend, but he certifies the claim as it appears in this bill for more than double what would have been the amount if it had been audited according to the decision of the Court of Claims rendered since the New York decision and rendered upon a reference by the very Comptroller himself who renders this decision.

Now, the time is very short for the examination of this matter.

There ought to be three or four hours' discussion of these items. There is not an item of detail before the Committee of the Whole in regard to these claims. I have been utterly unable to get any details. I believe that these items are not germane to a deficiency bill and ought to go out. I should like to hear any gentleman explain why these are proper items on a deficiency bill—how they can be construed as constituting a deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The statute which has been read in full plainly refers these several claims to the Auditor for reexamination and reauditing, with a view to allowance or disallowance. That has been done, as the gentleman from Illinois states, and the certificate of the Auditor is produced here.

Now, it has been repeatedly held that any audited account—not necessarily the judgment of a court, but any account audited by direction of Congress—is in order on a deficiency appropriation bill. That is this case. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend lines 13, 14, and 15 by striking out "$635,859.20," and inserting "$287,015.95."

The amendment of Mr. SIMS was read by the Clerk.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, we come to a discussion of the merits of the case, and I hope we may have an agreement for something more than the five minutes debate upon this amendment. What I propose to say with reference to one of these States will apply equally to all of them.

Mr. CANNON. The same principle governs these several cases.

Mr. GROSVENOR. All these cases have not been before the Court of Claims. As I understand, the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee is to set aside the finding of the Auditor and follow the finding of the Court of Claims.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There has been no finding of the Court of Claims in any of these cases.

Mr. SIMS. I suggest that the paragraphs in reference to these several States be considered all together.

Mr. CANNON. It will be very easy to dispose of these other items after the first one has been disposed of. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee desire for debate?

Mr. SIMS. I do not want a minute more than is necessary to get the matter before the House as clearly as I am able to do it, but the gentleman knows very well that frequently questions are asked and that takes time. I do not know how much time I will want, but I shall take just as little as I can get along with.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not do that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that the gentleman from Tennessee always fights every claim that lies north of the Ohio River.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman does not understand the thing.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee perfectly.

Mr. SIMS. I know the gentleman from Ohio is fair, and if he understood the situation he would not make that remark, I am satisfied. I am going to ask for unanimous consent——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I shall object.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, let me make the statement, and if you object then I have no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment, I would ask unanimous consent that debate on all these items—they are all similar—close in forty minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I think that is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. CANNON. Each side to have half.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate upon these paragraphs and amendments thereto be closed in forty minutes, the time to be equally divided between the two sides, Is there objection to that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object.

Mr. CANNON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the motion. The Chair will put the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as a remark dropped by the gentleman from Ohio does me a great injustice, I want to state for the benefit of the House just how this matter came to my attention. Separate bills for these items, in three of the States that I now remember, were introduced and referred to the Committee on War Claims, of which I am a member. We to some extent discussed them there, and that is how the matter came to my attention. I want to state further that the State of Kentucky is equally and vitally interested in this matter as any State north of the Ohio River. I want to get simply at what is right, and nothing else; and I do not care where the money goes. There was an act passed by the Congress of the United States in 1861—an act of reimbursement—which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the governor of any State, or to his duly authorized agents, the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the present insurrection against the United States, to be settled upon proper vouchers, to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

The United States Government paid back to those States the exact sum that the State had paid out. As held by former accounting officers of the Treasury, the Government would not, and did not, allow payments made by the States or anything except moneys paid out by the States. They did not allow the States interest upon bonds issued by the respective States by which to procure money for this purpose. Quite a number of years ago the State of New York brought suit in the Court of Claims to recover the sum of $91,000 as interest paid by the State of New York upon short-time bonds issued by that State, by means of which the State raised money to equip the troops, and for the sum of $39,000 for interest due by the State of New York to what was known as the canal fund. The Court of Claims decided that the item of interest on the bond issued by New York for this purpose was a proper charge against the Government, and was not in the nature of interest by the Government to its debtor where no special contract existed.

Of course it is well understood that the Government pays no interest except by special contract or on judgments. The Court of Claims disallowed the canal item. It was taken by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; many questions were presented that are not necessary here to discuss, but the Supreme Court of the United States did decide in the New York case that the interest paid by the State of New York to the canal fund or on account of bonds was a proper charge of reimbursement and it was reimbursed and paid. There are four other cases. The claims of the State of Rhode Island, the State of New Hampshire, the State of Maine, and the State of Pennsylvania were referred to the Court of Claims for decision after the New York case had been decided. They were referred by the Comptroller, and I wish to read the letter of reference to the House so that the House will know what the Court of Claims had before it and decided. Here is the Auditor's statement of the matters referred to the court:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 14, 1899.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR:

* * * * * * *

1. Have the accounting officers jurisdiction to entertain, adjust, and settle this claim on its merits, under the decision in the case of The United States v. New York (160 U. S., 598)?

(a) Is this claim for interest on money borrowed and expended in equipping troops so intimately connected with the principal claims already allowed that the interest claim can be held to have been settled in the settlement of the principal claims on the doctrine that a claimant can not be allowed to split up his cause of action?

(b) In view of the long delay in presenting this claim, is it "a stale claim," which the accounting officers should not entertain, adjust, or settle on its merits?

2. If the accounting officers have jurisdiction and should settle the claim, for what time ought interest to be allowed?

(a) Where long-time bonds were issued, should interest be allowed to the maturity of the bonds; if not, to what lesser time should it be allowed?

(b) Should interest be allowed beyond the time necessary for the State to levy a tax and collect the money required for the principal expenditure?

3. If the court finds it has jurisdiction to determine the amount due, what amount, if anything, is the State entitled to on the evidence and facts presented?

I transmit all the papers, proofs, documents, etc., pertaining to the claim, as requested.

Respectfully, yours, W. W. BROWN, Auditor.

This is the Maine case from which I am reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. The twenty minutes have not expired, have they?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman, as I understand it, controls twenty minutes of the forty.

The CHAIRMAN. That was objected to.

Mr. SIMS. I thought there was a motion made and carried.

The CHAIRMAN. It is beyond the authority of the committee to do anything more than close debate by motion.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. There are $8,000,000 directly and indirectly involved in this matter, and here is the decision of the court. If this House does not want to know the law, and does not want to vote intelligently, there is no use in my occupying five minutes. I am reading the decision of the court—I am not blowing my own horn.

Mr. CANNON. I again ask unanimous consent that the whole of the twenty minutes in opposition to this provision and for the amendment be under the control of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. I hope, Mr. Chairman, not to use all of the time. After full consideration of all the questions submitted, the court decided that the accounting officers have jurisdiction to settle the claim in this case, and the same should be adjusted by allowing the State interest as set forth in the findings, from the dates of the several loans made by her on the money found to have been properly expended in organizing and equipping the troops, for which the United States promised indemnity by the act of 1861, up to the date or dates when the Government reimbursed the State for the money so advanced, deducting therefrom the amount of direct tax chargeable against said State as of the date when due and chargeable, to wit, June 30, 1862.

The above is the determination and decision of the Court of Claims in the Maine case, submitted to them by the Comptroller after the New York case had been decided by the Supreme Court, applying the principles as laid down by the court in the New York case.

This is the decision of those five able judges. Their decision is that interest paid by the States may be reimbursed, but that when the United States Government made payments to those respective States, either by way of remission of direct tax or by direct payment, those payments should go as a credit upon the liability of the State against the United States, and stop interest on that amount from the time that it was paid until interest ceased to be paid by the State upon the respective obligations, bonds, or whatever the obligations might be.

The only questions to be considered in this case are these: The contention of the Comptroller, as I understand it, is that the Government is liable to the respective States for the bonds and interest to maturity of the bond, provided the bond ran to maturity. If the State of Indiana or any of these other States had issued bonds running twenty years, and by remission of the direct tax or by direct payment the whole amount up to the time of the payment had been paid before the maturity of the bonds issued by the States; that although the State of Indiana or any of these other States may have had that money in her coffers for ten years, thereby enabling her to buy in her own bonds if they were subject to be called in and paid off, or to be applied to any other State purposes, thereby relieving her citizens of taxes—that although that is the fact, the Government of the United States under the New York decision must pay the bonds with all the interest to maturity, providing the State has paid that much.

I contend, as a matter of justice, that the decision of the Court of Claims case should be followed, and that these should be treated as a matter of partial payments, as a matter of mutual indebtedness between the two, and that the offsets should be treated equitably. Remember, these four decisions of the Court of Claims were rendered after the decision in the New York case and pursuant to it.

Mr. COWHERD. And construing it.

Mr. SIMS. And construing it; and it was referred to them for that very purpose. Under the act of Congress making appropriations for urgent deficiencies for the present fiscal year, approved February 14, 1902, it is provided:

> In refunding to States expenses incurred in raising volunteers, namely:
> To the State of Maine, $131,515.81.
> To the State of Pennsylvania, $689,146.29.
> To the State of New Hampshire, $108,372.53.
> To the State of Rhode Island, $124,617.79.
> And the claims of like character arising under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stats., p. 276), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stats., p. 615), as interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the State of New York against the United States, decided January 6, 1896 (160 U. S. Repts., p. 598), not heretofore allowed, or heretofore disallowed, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be reopened, examined, and allowed, and, if deemed necessary, shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determination of disputed questions of law to aid in the settlement of the claims by the accounting officers.

These claims appropriated for in the above act had been submitted to the Court of Claims as an aid, as a guidance to the accounting officers. Now then, the claims of the four States that I have mentioned were settled; audited by the proper accounting officers according to the decision of the Court of Claims construing the New York decision. Four States have received their money and receipted for it under this decision; but when you come to the State of Indiana the Comptroller does not follow the Court of Claims decision, but renders a new decision, or a decision of his own, which doubles the amount by way of interest on all the States yet to be settled, and if adopted in this House there would be due the States that have already been settled with about two million and a half dollars.

There is something more than a million in this bill, and several of the States yet to settle with when their accounts are audited. If we follow the Comptroller instead of following the court, consisting of five judges, who construed and applied the principle decided in the New York case, you will have to pay about $8,000,000 more than you will have to do if you follow the decision of the Court of Claims. New York accepted the decision in her favor and was paid off. Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Pennsylvania also. This is the amount due and allowed by the Comptroller of the Treasury under his decision of April 14, 1902.

If this claim had been settled in accordance with the principles announced in the Court of Claims and followed by the Auditor of the War Department in the settlement of the claims of the States of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire and Rhode Island, already allowed and paid under the opinion of that court, there would be due to the State of Indiana by the United States for interest and expenses $129,174.05, for discount $150,840, making a total of $281,015.95. Now, each of these claims was followed by a note from the Auditor showing that, with the exception of the Ohio case—which makes but little difference—that it doubles in round numbers this appropriation to follow the Comptroller in his decision made in behalf of the State of Indiana after the Court of Claims had decided four like cases, otherwise following the New York case.

I know how embarrassing it is for any member of Congress to turn down a claim for his own State. It is for gentlemen to take the decision of the Court of Claims as right or that of the Comptroller. The Comptroller had accepted the decision in the case of four States. He has given his argument, and it is quite a strong argument. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is from one of the States interested, Illinois, and the gentleman [Mr. HEMENWAY] who has just spoken is from another of those States, and I am from Tennessee, but I wish in this case to know whether we members of Congress are to overrule the decision of a Court of Claims, the very court we authorized these cases to be referred to, or should we undertake to follow the decision of the Comptroller?

Now, which has the greater weight of authority—the Comptroller or the Court of Claims, the court designated by the very act itself to decide these matters, composed of five judges without interest, directly or indirectly? I am making an argument to get at this matter in the most disinterested way. The Comptroller has decided this according to his own judgment. The Court of Claims is a judicial body. They are more capable of determining and applying the principles of law as settled in the New York case than I am, than Congress is, than the Comptroller is.

Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] that we are all human in these things; and I will say to the gentleman that as we are all embarrassed in these matters when they come from our own States, that if he finds I bring up a Tennessee case that he does not approve I hope he will help me to put my principles in practice.

I do not mean to in any manner reflect upon the gentlemen whose States are interested, but let us divest ourselves of all these matters of embarrassment as far as possible and follow the best authority in deciding these matters, and this is the court to which these questions have been referred ever since it has been a court. The Government has been very liberal to the States. It has permitted them to be allowed interest, discount, and express charges. If we do not follow the decision in the New York case, then a precedent will be established, and you will have to reopen the whole of the cases that have already been settled, and go along and do the same thing with the other States that have to be settled with hereafter.

I make this appeal for the sake of the Treasury. I am not the watchdog of the Treasury, but when the watchdog, Mr. CANNON, is slightly muzzled by embarrassing interests in his own State, I know he will let me bark for him if I can. [Laughter.] Now, let me tell you the difference in these sums.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What would be the amount due under the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. SIMS. The amounts for these several States, as shown by the bill, are:

> To the State of Indiana, $635,859.20.
> NOTE.—This is the amount found due and allowed by the Comptroller of the Treasury under his decision of April 14, 1902.
> If this claim had been settled in accordance with the principles announced by the Court of Claims and followed by the Auditor for the War Department in the settlement of the claims of the States of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, already allowed and paid under the findings of that court, there would be due the State of Indiana from the United States on this claim—

For interest and expenses	$135,169.05
For discount	151,846.90
Making a total of	287,015.25

instead of the amount certified.

To the State of Iowa, $456,417.89.

NOTE.—This allowance is based upon the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury dated April 14, 1902.

If this claim had been settled in accordance with the principles announced by the Court of Claims and followed by the Auditor for the War Department in the settlement of the claims of the States of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, already allowed and paid under the findings of that court, there would be due the State of Iowa from the United States on this claim $229,699.62 instead of the amount certified. (See House Doc. No. 654.)

To the State of Michigan, $382,167.62.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 9, 1902.

I certify that I have examined and settled the claim of the State of Michigan for refundment of moneys paid as interest on loans from July 10, 1861, to January 1, 1870, and other expenses incurred in procuring funds to suppress the rebellion during 1861-1865, and find that there is due from the United States the sum of $382,167.62 for interest and discount allowed by the Comptroller of the Treasury for the period from July 10, 1861, to August 20, 1866, in the sum of $255,397.76, and an additional amount found due the State by this office under the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury dated May 28, 1902, for interest from August 20, 1866, to January 1, 1870, and other expenses in the sum of $126,769.86.

Appropriation: Refunding to States expenses incurred in raising volunteers.

To be reported to Congress under section 2 of the deficiency appropriation act of July 7, 1884.

Payable to: The Governor of the State of Michigan, Lansing, Mich., "when an appropriation shall have been made."

I further certify that if this claim had been settled in accordance with the principles announced by the Court of Claims and followed by this office in the settlement of the claims of the States of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, already allowed and paid under the findings of that court, there would be due the State of Michigan for interest and expenses $130,725.36, and for discount $32,644.77, making a total of $163,370.13 instead of the amount certified.

F. E. RITTMAN,
Auditor for the War Department.
By E. P. SEEDS,
Deputy Auditor.

To the State of Ohio, $458,559.35.

This is the amount found due and allowed by the Comptroller of the Treasury June 2, 1902. The Comptroller, in his certificate, further states that had this claim been settled by him, applying the principles of the decision of the Court of Claims in the case of the State of Maine (36 C. Cls. R., 53), he would have found due the State of Ohio the sum of $443,145.24 instead of the amount certified.

To the State of Illinois, $1,005,129.29.

Of this amount $774,560.28 was found due by the Comptroller of the Treasury for discount and interest on loans from July 1, 1861, to July 1, 1867, in his decision of June 4, 1902, and an additional amount of $230,569.01 was found due by the Auditor for the War Department for interest from July 1, 1867, to January 1, 1880, under the decisions of the Comptroller of April 14, 1902, and June 4, 1902. If this claim had been settled in accordance with the principles announced by the Court of Claims and followed by the Auditor for the War Department in the settlement of the claims of the States of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, already allowed and paid under the findings of that court, there would be due the State of Illinois for interest and expenses $202,491.81, and for discount $232,605, making a total of $435,096.81 instead of the amount certified.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman from Illinois let me read the items of the other two States?

Mr. CANNON. There will be no trouble about that. If the gentleman's contention is right, the claim of my State will be cut down largely over one-half.

Mr. SIMS. But I want to show the exact figures.

Mr. CANNON. I can not in justice to my colleagues yield any further to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask, then, that I may add these in the RECORD, so as to make the statement complete.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; put it in the RECORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the House long enough to brush away the cobwebs which have been thrown around this matter by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me a question, I want to ask him what is the reason why the disposition of the Court of Claims should not be followed?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no decision of the Court of Claims in these matters, and all this talk about the Court of Claims having decided one of these cases is a mistake. Not one of them was ever before the Court of Claims. Upon the other hand, they have been decided by a court higher than the Court of Claims. They have been decided by the Comptroller of the Treasury, whose decision is final upon all of these audited accounts. And they have been decided by a lawyer whose honesty and ability have never been questioned. He was anxious that Congress should have full information and went to the extent of calling attention to both audits of all these claims, showing the amount due in case his decision was not accepted, and the calculation in the case of the State of Maine accepted.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman. Not one of these matters has been to the Court of Claims. In 1861, while the country was in war and could not raise money, it asked the Northern States to raise money and equip the troops and arm them and put them in the field. By legislation the United States agreed to pay the States back the money they expended. Nearly all of the Northern States went to work and raised money, equipped the troops, and put them into the field. Later on, after the war was over, the State of Indiana, the State of Michigan, State of Iowa, the State of Illinois, and numerous other States, the filed their claim for the money they had expended.

The then Comptroller of the Treasury held that the States could only be paid back the principal sum that they borrowed and not the interest that they paid on that sum. For instance, the State of Indiana borrowed $2,000,000 and had to pay some half million dollars as interest in order to discharge that debt. The Comptroller held that the Government could only pay back the principal and not the interest. A number of the States were turned down by the Comptroller at that time.

Time passed, and the claims were barred by limitation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me suggest that the Attorney-General indorsed the opinion of the Comptroller.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes. Then New York filed a claim, and it went to the Comptroller and to the Court of Claims and then to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court held that the Government should pay to the States every dollar that they paid out in order to discharge that debt. They virtually said this: "Here is a man in distress, and he asks a friend to borrow some money for him. The friend borrowed the money and helped him out. Later on he goes to him and says: 'Here is the principal you borrowed for me.' 'Yes,' he says, 'but hold on; here are four years' interest that has accumulated. I had to pay interest on this principal.' 'Oh,' he says, 'I do not care about interest; here is your principal.'" That was the position that the Comptroller put the Government in, saying to the States, "We, the Government, are going to beat you out of the interest."

Now, how was it with the State of Indiana? I want the House to understand the exact circumstances of the case. Indiana, at the request of the United States Government, during the administration of our great war governor, Oliver P. Morton, borrowed $2,000,000. At that time we were in almost as bad condition financially as the Government of the United States. Our credit was impaired. But upon the urgent recommendation of the Government we issued bonds to the amount of $2,000,000 and sold them for the best money we could get for them. We had to accept a discount.

Many citizens of Indiana bought those bonds. They were issued in denominations of $500, so that patriotic citizens of small means could buy them. They bought them at a discount; but when they came back to get their money many of them refused to accept the discount and accepted the amount they paid; and in this way there was paid back to the State of Indiana over $73,000 of the discount. Indiana gave the Government credit for every cent saved in this way. We commenced paying off those bonds just as soon as the State could raise the money, in order to save the Government every dollar that we could. We only sold bonds as the money was necessary for use, and we redeemed them as rapidly as possible. I will attach a complete statement showing when bonds were sold and when redeemed.

In August, 1861, we commenced paying these bonds, and by November 30, 1862, we had redeemed over $1,000,000 of those bonds. Up to that time the Government had not paid Indiana one cent on the debt.

Now, all that the State of Indiana or the State of Illinois or Ohio or any of these States asks is that the Government shall pay back to them just the amount in dollars and cents that they paid out, without one cent of interest.

Mr. COWHERD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is not this distinction: That under the decisions rendered by the Court of Claims in the Pennsylvania and Maine cases, following the decision in the case of New York, the Government was allowed to credit its partial payments on the indebtedness, but in the appropriations you make here you charge interest for the entire time, notwithstanding the Government had paid a part of the indebtedness.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly that is not the case. In the Maine case there were a number of partial payments, but as I have shown, in the Indiana case we had actually paid off nearly all the debt before the Government ever paid us a dollar, so that in this case there is no question of partial payments at all. There is no such a question in the Ohio case, and that question arises only to a limited extent in the Illinois case.

When the Government made its last payment to the State of Indiana a limited number of the bonds of the State were unpaid. The State could not call in those bonds at once. And will it be contended that the State should be beaten out of the interest because the State could not call in her bonds? Why, sir, only recently, during the present Administration, the Government of the United States has been buying its own bonds and paying a premium upon them. Do you want to say that because the State of Indiana or any other State could not get the people who held her bonds to give them up at once you are going to beat the State out of the interest which they had to pay?

Now, for thirty-three years, in the case of the State of Indiana, the Government has been owing the State $635,000. There is no question of partial payments involved. Yet for that long time Indiana has been borrowing money and paying interest on it when she could have discharged $635,000 of her debt if the Government had paid her back—not any interest on the money she had paid out but the bare dollars and cents she paid out for the purpose of equipping troops and for the interest on the bonds that she paid. Not one State in this case is asking for a cent of interest.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a question? He has explained this matter to me very satisfactorily except on one point, and that is whether the Government has paid interest after the time when the principal was paid.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Only as I have stated, to a very limited extent. It so happens that in the Maine case a number of partial payments were made.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I will yield the gentleman another minute.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I simply want to answer the question. In the Maine case there were some partial payments made, but, as I have stated, in the Indiana case that consideration does not apply at all, nor in the Ohio case. It applies only to a limited extent in the Illinois and other cases. But in any event would you refuse to pay interest when the State could not take in her bonds?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But if she has been getting interest on the Government money should she not make a rebate?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then, I ask the gentleman, should not the Government pay us interest on the $635,000 that she has owed us for years?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We are not asking that, and we have said that it wiped out over and over again any question of partial payments. I simply ask this House to be fair with the State. We are here at this late day, and why? Because it took special legislation to get this matter up, and that special legislation we only secured at this session, and it is only paying back to the States money that she advanced in order to help the Government in a time of distress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, very briefly I want to enlarge a little bit on what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] has said. I have the act of Congress that was passed in 1861 before me. It is as follows:

> That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed out of any money in the Treasury to pay to the governor of any State, or his duly authorized agents, the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such States for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the insurrections, * * * to be settled upon by vouchers, etc.

Now, then, the act of 1862 is substantially the same, but covers transactions before the act of 1861 was passed. Now, bear with me a minute. The State of Indiana under that law borrowed $2,000,000 in 1861–62, on twenty years' time at 6 per cent interest, sold the bonds at 15 per cent discount and besides some other expenses. Indiana has paid those bonds, principal and interest; paid them in 1868, or 1869, or 1870.

Mr. HEMENWAY. She had $80,000 paid in 1868.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. She has paid them all, principal and interest. Now, then, the Comptroller of the Treasury, away back years ago, said to Indiana, "You shall have your two millions, you shall have the net amount of money that you got on your two millions of bonds, but you must lose the discount, and notwithstanding you paid twenty years' interest, more or less, you shall not have your interest." Now, the same thing was said to the State of New York in a similar case. New York went to law and finally went to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court said by its solemn judgment as follows:

> It is as if the United States had borrowed the money through the agency of the State.

That is, the United States constituted the States its agents to borrow money. It follows that every cent such States were compelled to pay out on account of loans should be reimbursed to them by their principal, the United States, without any deduction or rebate whatsoever.

Now, then, the interest on the twenty-year bonds was not interest. It is principal, and all the decision does and all this $700,000 does is to have the United States pay back to Indiana the balance of the $2,000,000 and the interest up to the time the bonds were paid, none of them being paid after maturity. That was over twenty-five years ago, and the United States has owed Indiana $700,000 under the law as laid down by the Supreme Court, and in justice, and owed it for over a quarter of a century, and not one cent does this appropriation give Indiana for that interest for over a quarter of a century. It only makes Indiana whole on the bonds and the interest that she absolutely paid out, as I say, over a quarter of a century ago. Indiana is the loser. She is out the interest upon that amount for over twenty-five years. I say again that not one cent of interest do we propose to pay by this appropriation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. If the Comptroller in deciding this case and certifying this amount to the Appropriations Committee did not state and does not now state that if he had followed the decision of the Court of Claims construing the New York case that the amount would be less than appropriated?

Mr. CANNON. No; what he said was this——

Mr. HEMENWAY. He said he followed the New York case.

Mr. CANNON. Followed the New York case. What next happened? Congress come in and legislated last February that we should follow the audit of the Court of Claims—for the State of Maine? No. The audit of the Court of Claims for the State of Maine said where the United States paid money to the State of Maine, although her bonds were not due, that the State of Maine should take it and apply it on her bonds as if they were due. Now, that is the Court of Claims audit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. She got the benefit of that in the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON. With that audit what happened? This Congress, this session of Congress, directs that all these claims of States shall be reopened and settled according to what? The New York case decided by the Supreme Court. There is the decision, there is the legislation, and here is the audit, and still that does not give Indiana or Illinois or Ohio or Michigan one cent of interest on the amount that they paid and to which they were entitled under the decision of the Supreme Court twenty-five years ago. Now, with that statement I want to say that in my judgment the decision of the Supreme Court was right, and this audit is right under that decision and under the express direction of this Congress at this session. It is right in God's chancery, it is right in man's chancery, and I ask for a vote upon the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. If my time has not expired, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. COWHERD. I want to know if it is not a fact that after the New York case was decided, and in accordance with the principles of law there laid down, the Court of Claims passed upon the Pennsylvania and New Hampshire and Maine cases?

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary, they did not, in accordance with the decision.

Mr. COWHERD. Well, they did in accordance with their idea of the decision.

Mr. CANNON. And they did not adjudicate anything. They only audited.

Mr. COWHERD. Did they not distinctly refer to the decision and quote it?

Mr. CANNON. It was directly in the teeth of the decision, and for that reason Congress steps in and says, "We will pay this according to the New York case," which was the Supreme Court case, in the terms which I read here this afternoon.

Mr. COWHERD. I should like to ask the gentleman further if this decision of the Comptroller is not an appeal from an adverse decision of the Auditor, following the Court of Claims.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the Comptroller is always the last man to pass on an Auditor's account, and he reverses the Auditor three times a week on an average, I should think, and maybe more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it proposed to vote on these four paragraphs in gross?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. If there be no objection the Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. There are four amendments.

Mr. CANNON. The first one settles them all in principle.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows;

Amend in lines 13, 14 and 15, by striking out $635,869.20 and inserting $287,015.95.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read down to line 6 on page 72.

Mr. BINGHAM (who had been standing during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SIMS. I offered four amendments, and only one has been voted on.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It was agreed to vote on one and take that as a decision of the whole.

Mr. SIMS. That is perfectly satisfactory. I did not understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BINGHAM. My amendment is to come in after line 24 on page 71.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Too late, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BINGHAM. I rose for the purpose of claiming recognition, and the Clerk went on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was standing, but the Chair did not understand for what purpose.

Mr. CANNON. I think you had better go back and let the amendment be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the statement of the gentleman, the Chair will recognize him for the purpose of offering his amendment. The Chair saw the gentleman standing. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 24, page 71:

"Provided, That the like claims of the States of Pennsylvania, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, or other States for expenses incurred in raising volunteers for the war of the rebellion shall be reopened and reaudited and allowed by the Auditor of the War Department in accordance with the methods of interest calculations adopted by the Comptroller of the Treasury in the settlement of the claims of the States of Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Iowa, and Michigan, and the said Auditor is directed to reopen the claims of all States not so audited and allow the same according to the method adopted by the Comptroller of the Treasury in the settlements heretofore referred to, notwithstanding the fact that any such State or States have accepted payments on items heretofore allowed them by any Auditor."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. There can be no debate upon this amendment. By order of the committee debate is exhausted upon this paragraph and all amendments.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I think that ought to be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to speak for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we should dispose first of the pending amendments offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HEMENWAY. They are all disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I presume that, if necessary, five minutes will be allowed on this side, and so I do not object.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] reserves the point of order against the amendment, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, of course I do not know what the gentleman's point of order is; but I believe the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk is germane to the paragraph just passed under the heading for refunding to States expenses incurred in raising volunteers, because of its relation to the subject under consideration.

This committee within the past five minutes has established, in the sum total allowed for the five States of Iowa, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio, a certain finding and adjustment of accounts on a basis determined upon by the Comptroller of the Treasury.

You have adopted it, and I simply come in and ask that there may be an extension of that act of this committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the gentlemen on that side contended that they were only being settled with now on the same basis that you have been settled with.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am assuming that they are settled upon a different basis as to interest allowances. The claim of Pennsylvania was determined by the Court of Claims in the exact amount allowed in the urgent deficiency bill, approved February 14, 1902. Under the authority of said deficiency bill the Comptroller of the Treasury has determined the claims of the States included in the pending bill, and this committee has approved his findings and interest allowances upon a basis of calculation that will give the State of Pennsylvania a larger allowance than was given in the urgent deficiency bill of February 14, 1902.

This increased allowance will also run to the benefit of other States whose accounts are considered as settled under the Dockery law of 1894. A claim once settled can not be reopened unless by act of Congress. Therefore by your vote in committee five minutes ago you approve a settlement of these five States in the adjustment of interest allowances under the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury a larger allowance than other States whose claims are alleged to have been settled, and exclude us from reopening the same because the Dockery law runs.

Permit me to submit that the States that loaned the money to the Government during the war are entitled to be settled all upon exactly the same basis; and whatever the ruling of the Comptroller is, and you have approved it, I claim that the States included in the deficiency bill on February last and other States settled with prior to that time have the right to have their cases reopened and readjusted on the rulings of the Comptroller accepted by this committee in the claims of States included in this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it perfectly clear that the gentleman is right in that statement? Because, if he is, I agree with him that his amendment ought to prevail, because the States ought to be settled with exactly alike and on the same basis.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is what I claim and all that I claim.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman from Indiana a few moments ago to say that the claims were not alike, and that the adjustment now for the State of Indiana and these other States was exactly alike and followed the settlement in the case of the State of New York.

Mr. BINGHAM. The State of Pennsylvania is not different from the case of Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I stated that the settlement in the Indiana case and these cases now being settled was exactly like the settlement in the New York case.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then why is there any necessity for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Court of Claims did not follow the New York decision in the settlement of the claims of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and some of the other States. They absolutely refused. If any intelligent man will read that decision and read the New York decision he can see that they did not follow it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the State of Pennsylvania get anything under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it is adopted?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Why, if the settlement is to be the same along the same line?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It will not be along the same line.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a point of order pending, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama reserved the point of order. Does he make it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do; I make the point of order, and I desire to discuss it. I suppose there is no question about the point of order being well taken. I wish to state my reasons for insisting on it now. It seems that a little while ago it was contended to the House that we were only paying these claims by these various States according to the decision of the court. The Court of Claims decided the New Hampshire case and the Pennsylvania case was paid according to that decision, and the Court of Claims decided these cases, construing the New York case. That is the reason we contended a few minutes ago that this amendment should not be passed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, in the New York case the Court of Claims decided one way and the State of New York appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed the Court of Claims. That was in the original litigation. Now, then, the Pennsylvania and these other cases went to the Court of Claims after having been reversed by the Supreme Court decision, not on the proposition laid down in that case.

Mr. MANN. They had lawyers, had they not?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The State of Pennsylvania as well as Illinois wants to have the case settled.

Mr. COWHERD. In response to the gentleman from Indiana that the Court of Claims did not follow the New York case, I want to read for his information:

> In the leading case of the United States v. The State of New York (160 U. S. Reports, p. 98) the Supreme Court laid down and established certain principles which are applicable to this case and to those of the other States and which control and determine the rights and liabilities of the parties.

The gentleman says that they proceeded to follow it out according to their own idea.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then the gentleman from Indiana must be wrong.

Mr. COWHERD. There is a difference of opinion between the Court of Claims and the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I did not hear the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no question but what the New York case was decided, and the Pennsylvania case was considered in the Court of Claims subject to the New York case, and there the amount fixed, and their lawyers, failing to take an appeal, accepted it; that it was within the terms of the New York case. And, now, when these cases were referred to the War Department, the Auditor of the War Department said that under that decision of the Supreme Court in the New York case, in the Pennsylvania case they should receive less than was appropriated here. It was not until it came to the Comptroller that he added this additional amount.

Now, I do not think there is any doubt that the Comptroller went beyond the New York case and beyond the Court of Claims. I am going to insist upon my point of order. I will say to the gentleman that in this case the Senate of the United States may put this appropriation back where it ought to be, and if it does, then Pennsylvania ought to have nothing more; but if the Senate refuses; if it is attempted by Pennsylvania to get any more——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. One moment. If the Senate refuses then I would be willing to pay Pennsylvania nothing. But I say nothing more should be given than the courts have decided they are entitled to. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] makes a point of order against the amendment proposed by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM]. I am not sure that he stated his point of order; but if so, I was unable to hear it, owing to confusion in the Hall.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That it is new legislation.

Mr. OLMSTED. By voting down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], this House, or rather the Committee of the Whole, has already indicated its intention to allow these items for the States of Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Ohio, and Illinois.

The amendment simply provides that the accounts of the States of Pennsylvania, Maine, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island shall be adjusted upon the same basis. Whatever parliamentary technicality may be urged against the amendment, in this place and at this time, it is manifestly ungenerous and unfair to put the four States named in the amendment upon any different basis from that enjoyed by the States named in the bill.

I do not understand that there is any great dispute as to the law of the matter. In the case of the United States against the State of New York (160 U. S. Reports, 598), Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, said, commencing on page 621:

> We can not doubt that the interest paid by the State on its bonds, issued to raise money for the purposes expressed by Congress, constituted a part of the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by it for those objects. Such interest, when paid, became a principal sum, as between the State and the United States—that is, became part of the aggregate sum properly paid by the State for the United States. The principal and interest so paid constitutes a debt from the United States to the State. It is as if the United States had itself borrowed the money through the agency of the State.

This appropriation bill, as it now stands, provides for the payment of the claims of the five States upon precisely that basis. We ask that Pennsylvania, Maine, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island shall be similarly treated. The Comptroller of the Treasury, in his opinion in the Indiana case, says that the Court of Claims was led into error in the Maine case "by adopting the calculation of an accountant, who no doubt is a good accountant, whose figures are no doubt correct, but who has not shown himself possessed of either a legal or an equitable mind." The same observation applies to the Pennsylvania case.

As will appear from Senate Document No. 321, page 29, the adjustment was made "by allowing the State interest from the dates of the several loans made by it to raise money necessary to organize and equip troops, for which the United States promised indemnity by the act of 1861 up to the date or dates when the Government recognized the claims, deducting therefrom the amount of direct tax chargeable against said State as of the date due and chargeable, to wit, June 30, 1862.

I call attention particularly to the phrase "up to the date or dates when the Government recognized the claims for the money so advanced." There was apparently a computation of interest upon the amount advanced by the State up to that time. The decision of the Supreme Court, however, in the New York case is to the effect that the interest paid by a State upon a loan made for the use of the General Government is, as between the State and the Federal Government, to be treated not as interest but as principal, and all the interest that the State had to pay is to be thus treated as principal. The State of Pennsylvania issued bonds payable in ten years, with interest payable semiannually. All the interest that the State had to pay during all those ten years was, as between the State and the United States, to be treated as principal.

But in the Pennsylvania case and also in the Maine case the computation was made by ascertaining how much the State had borrowed for the General Government, then computing interest on that "up to the date or dates when the Government recognized the claims for the money so advanced." The proper way, under the decision of the Supreme Court, was to ascertain the entire amount expended by Pennsylvania, including not only the principal of the bonds but the full ten years' interest thereon, and treating this aggregate as the principal debt owed to the State by the United States.

From that amount there was properly deductible the direct tax chargeable against the State of Pennsylvania as of June 30, 1862. That is the method of computation approved by the Comptroller of the Treasury and applied to the cases of Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Ohio, and Illinois in ascertaining the amounts which are appropriated to those States in this bill. That is simple justice as between the United States and the State of Pennsylvania, and between Pennsylvania and the five States named. The same principle applies also to Maine, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. Pennsylvania borrowed this money at a lower rate of interest than the Federal Government was paying.

In order to sell the bonds she put in a clause exempting them from all State and local taxation. They were mostly taken by our own citizens, so that the State lost for ten years or more the taxation of that much capital otherwise taxable within her borders. For that we make no claim. We ask only to be put upon the same footing as other States, whose response to the call of the Government was no more prompt and whose citizens no more patriotic than our own. I trust that the gentleman will, as a matter of common fairness, withdraw his point of order and allow this amendment to be considered upon its merits.

The CHAIRMAN. This provision is clearly a legislative provision, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous expenses, United States courts, $134.10.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 21, page 75, the following:
"For payment to John C. White for salary as chargé d'affaires ad interim at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, from December 23, 1878, to June 30, 1880, $2,030.63."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I make the point of order on that.

Mr. BOUTELL. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to reserve his point of order long enough for me to ask unanimous consent to insert in favor of this amendment a letter from the Secretary of State, showing on what this claim is based.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to insert a letter which he has indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 13, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo in which you request my views in reference to the bill (H. R. 1453) for the relief of John C. White on account of services rendered the Government of the United States as chargé d'affaires ad interim at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, from December 23, 1878, to March 27, 1879, and from April 11, 1880, to June 30, 1880, inclusive.

The records of the Department of State show that Mr. White was appointed secretary of the legation of the United States at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on June 28, 1878, and tendered his resignation of the office on August 8, 1883, and that between those dates, in the absence of a minister, he acted as chargé d'affaires ad interim during the periods mentioned in the bill, viz, from December 23, 1878, to March 27, 1879, inclusive, and from April 11, 1880, to June 30, 1880, inclusive.

Previous to July 1, 1878, and subsequent to June 30, 1880, the law allowed and does now allow compensation to chargés d'affaires ad interim at the rate of 50 per cent of the amount of the minister's salary. But the act of Congress, approved June 4, 1878, making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, contained the following:

"That hereafter chargés d'affaires ad interim shall receive no additional pay beyond that which the law provides for the regular offices which they hold in their respective legations" (vol. 20, Stat. L., p. 92), and omitted, as did the corresponding act of the following year, approved January 27, 1879, any appropriation for such additional compensation.

Consequently, for the periods stated Mr. White received no compensation other than that which the law allowed for his office of secretary of legation, which, deducted from the amounts he would have received as chargé d'affaires ad interim, had the service been performed previous to July 1, 1878, or subsequent to June 30, 1880, makes his claim stand as follows:

By salary as chargé d'affaires ad interim from December 23, 1878, to March 27, 1879, inclusive	$1,565.74
To salary as secretary of legation from December 23, 1878, to March 27, 1879	469.73
		$1,096.01
By salary as chargé d'affaires ad interim from April 11, 1880, to June 30, 1880, inclusive	1,335.17
To salary as secretary of legation from April 11, 1880, to June 30, 1880, inclusive	400.55
		934.62
Total amount to which Mr. White is entitled if allowance be made for services as chargé d'affaires ad interim for periods stated		2,030.63

Mr. White's is but one of a number of similar claims which my predecessor, the Hon. James G. Blaine, recommended to the favorable consideration of Congress on February 18, 1890 (see House Ex. Doc. No. 225, Fifty-first Congress, first session). It appears, however, that Mr. White's claim for services from December 23, 1878, to March 27, 1879, was omitted from the accounts of claims accompanying that recommendation. This omission was doubtless unintentional, for, as already stated, the records of the Department show that he was during that period chargé d'affaires ad interim.

In connection with the general subject, I have the honor to call your attention to the provision made in the general deficiency act approved March 3, 1899 (Stat. L., vol. 30, p. 1214), for the payment of the like claim of Wickham Hoffman.

In view of the precedent established in his case, and the fact that the claims all stand on the same footing and are equally just and meritorious, the Department is of opinion that they should all receive the same treatment.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

Hon. H. S. BOUTELL,
Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I usk unanimous consent to return to page 20 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to return to page 20 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the amendment is.

Mr. COWHERD. The amendment I wish to offer is, on page 20, where it treats of telegraph and telephone service. I want to regulate the price of telephones in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after the approval of this measure it shall be unlawful for any person or company doing a telephone business in the District of Columbia to charge or receive for telephone service in excess of the rates following, that is to say: For measured service, 3 cents a message when the subscriber's telephone is upon a separate line and 2 cents a message when there are two or more telephones on the same line; for unmeasured or for flat-rate service over a metallic circuit, $50 per annum when there is but one telephone on a line; $40 per annum for each telephone, there being not more than two on a line; and $30 per annum for each telephone, there being two or more on a line, such charge in each case to include use of suitable telephone with necessary equipments and the cost of maintaining the same in good condition for service: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to the rates to be charged for long-distance messages—that is, messages to or from points beyond the District of Columbia—or for the use of telephones on private lines, or any service which has for its purpose communication between telephones not connected with a telephone exchange: And provided further, That for the use of extra equipments, such as supplemental or desk telephones, telephone booths, or the like, furnished to any customer in addition to a suitable telephone and its necessary equipment, an extra and reasonable charge may be made therefor: And provided further, That where service shall be furnished to any point distant more than 2 miles from any telephone exchange of such person or corporation furnishing such service an extra charge may be made not to exceed 20 per cent of the rates above fixed for each half mile in excess of such 2 miles.

Mr. MANN (before the reading of the amendment was concluded). Mr. Chairman, that amendment has been read far enough to indicate its purpose. I make the point of order that it is not germane and that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15108) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with amendments and with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and the bill as amended be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [A pause.] If not, the Chair will submit the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] will preside at the session of the House this evening.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 8 o'clock p. m. resumed its session, Mr. DALZELL in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session this evening, pursuant to a special order, for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The pending business was the bill (H. R. 13172) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribe of Indians, and for other purposes.

The pending question was upon an amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi to an amendment of Mr. CURTIS.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In connection with my amendment, I merely wish to say that I submitted it to all the members of the committee who were upon the floor, and there is no objection to it. I think it ought to pass.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCRAE. I now move to amend the amendment as amended by inserting between the word "Indian" and "who" the words "and the descendants of any person who received a patent of land under the said fourteenth article of the said treaty of 1830."

The amendment of Mr. MCRAE was read by the Clerk.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, when the treaty between the United States and the Choctaws of September 27, 1830, known as the "treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek," was made there were many of the citizens of that tribe who were desirous to remain and become citizens of the States and were unwilling to leave their old home and move to the Indian country. On that account and to satisfy them the fourteenth article of said treaty, which is as follows, was inserted:

ARTICLE XIV. Each Choctaw head of a family being desirous to remain and become a citizen of the States shall be permitted to do so, by signifying his intention to the agent within six months from the ratification of this treaty, and he or she shall thereupon be entitled to a reservation of one section of 640 acres of land, to be bounded by sectional lines of survey; in like manner shall be entitled to one-half that quantity for each unmarried child which is living with him over 10 years of age; and a quarter section to such child as may be under 10 years of age, to adjoin the location of the parent. If they reside upon said lands, intending to become citizens of States for five years after the ratification of this treaty, in that case a grant in fee simple shall issue; said reservation shall include the present improvement of the head of the family, or a portion of it. Persons who claim under this article shall not lose the privilege of a Choctaw citizen, but if they ever remove are not entitled to any portion of the Choctaw annuity.

It is known that many Choctaws remained in and have become citizens of the States, as they had the right to do under this treaty, and by so doing did not "lose the privileges of a Choctaw citizen." The right of all such in the lands of the tribe was just as secure as if they had removed with the tribe. But if they ever remove, says the treaty, they "are not entitled to any portion of the Choctaw annuity." In every other respect they have and should have the same rights as other members of the tribe if they do move.

The Government Indian agent, Colonel Ward, failed to make a correct list of the Choctaws who sought to avail themselves of the fourteenth article of the said treaty, and it is admitted that what is known as the "Ward register" shows only a small part of the applicants who within six months actually signified their intention of remaining in the States.

Congress, by the act approved March 3, 1837 (5 Stat., p. 180), authorized the appointment of a commission to adjust the claims to reservations of lands under said fourteenth article of said treaty. And by the act approved August 23, 1842 (5 Stat., 513), another commission was appointed to adjust and provide for the satisfaction of claims under said treaty.

The evident purpose of both of these acts of Congress was to try to do substantial justice to the Choctaws who remained in the States by securing their property rights in the "States" under the fourteenth article of said treaty, and also preserving their rights in the common inheritance in the Choctaw Nation, should they or their descendants desire at any time to move there. Some of the applicants before Colonel Ward received patents for their lands and some did not.

The descendants of Samuel Cobb, one of those who got a patent, reside in my district, and they are among our best citizens. They believe that they have the legal and the just right to share in the Choctaw lands, and they have expressed a desire to move there and assume the burdens and enjoy the privileges of Choctaw citizens. They have applied to the Commission to be identified as Mississippi Choctaws under existing law, and have submitted what appears to be incontrovertible proof that they are the descendants of a Choctaw who received a patent to lands under the said treaty.

Upon this proof I insist that they should be identified without regard to the quantity of Indian blood in their veins. There is no question but that they have Indian blood, but they are not full bloods. The treaty of 1830 made no distinction between the full and mixed bloods, and we should be careful in our efforts to help the full blood not to hurt the mixed blood.

I agree to the idea that all full-bloods should be identified, for I think the fact that they are now full-bloods should be accepted as proof that their ancestors were also Choctaws. But I also insist that where the records of the General Land Office show that a certain Choctaw citizen received a patent to lands under the treaty of 1830 this record should also be received as proof that the party who so received it was a Choctaw and that his or her descendants, upon proof that they are such descendants, should be identified and allowed to make settlement with the view of receiving allotments.

The reason for the rule in one case is just as fair as in the other, and the record is more likely to impart verity. There was no purpose on the part of the United States to preserve the pure Choctaw blood. The question of intermarriage with the whites was not dealt with by Congress, It was left with the tribal government so far as those who moved West were concerned. The Choctaw laws not only permitted but encouraged intermarriage with whites.

As to those who remained in the States, the State laws controlled, and none of them prohibited intermarriage. If, then, Mississippi Choctaws had the right to remain in the States, and had the right to intermarry with the whites, why should the mixed-blood descendants not have all the rights of the full-blood?

Judge Clayton, in the Horne case, decided this very point in the following language:

> That all Mississippi Choctaws and their descendants were entitled, upon their removal to the Choctaw Nation, to all the privileges of a Choctaw citizen, except to the right to participate in their annuities. This right of citizenship being conferred by the treaty, no law afterwards enacted by the Choctaw council can deprive them of that right because it would be in conflict with the treaty which confers that right to them and their descendants, without reference to the quantity of Indian blood. If they are descendants of Choctaw ancestors, it is sufficient. (Ibid., 118.)

Congress, up to this time, has followed the rule laid down by Judge Clayton, and has carefully guarded the rights of the Mississippi Choctaws, and I hope nothing will now be done to impair such rights.

The treaty of 1866 had the following provision in it:

> ART. 13. The notice required in the above article shall be given, not only in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, but by publication in newspapers printed in the States of Mississippi and Tennessee, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Alabama, to the end that such Choctaws and Chickasaws as yet remain outside of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations may be informed and have opportunity to exercise the rights hereby given to resident Choctaws and Chickasaws.
>
> Provided, That before any such absent Choctaw or Chickasaw shall be permitted to select for him or herself, or others, as hereinafter provided, he or she shall satisfy the register of the land office of his or her intention, or the intention of the party for whom the selection is to be made, to become bona fide resident in the said nation within five years from the time of selection; and should the said absentee fail to remove into said nation and occupy and commence an improvement on the land selected within the time aforesaid, the selection shall be canceled, and the land shall thereafter be discharged from all claim on account thereof.

The act of June 28, 1898, provides that—

> Said commission shall have authority to determine the identity of Choctaw Indians claiming rights in the Choctaw lands under article 14 of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Nation, concluded September 27, 1830, and to that end they may administer oaths, examine witnesses, and perform all other acts necessary thereto, and make report to the Secretary of the Interior. (Fourth paragraph, sec. 21, act of Congress approved June 28, 1898.)

The act of May 31, 1900, preserves their right to make settlement until the approval of the final rolls by the Secretary.

> That any Mississippi Choctaw, duly identified as such by the United States Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, shall have the right, at any time prior to the approval of the final rolls of the Choctaws and Chickasaws by the Secretary of the Interior, to make settlement within the Choctaw-Chickasaw country, and on proof of the fact of bona fide settlement may be enrolled by the said United States Commission and by the Secretary of the Interior as Choctaws entitled to allotment: Provided further, That all contracts or agreements looking to the sale or incumbrance in any way of the lands to be allotted to said Mississippi Choctaws shall be null and void. (Indian appropriation act, approved May 31, 1900.)

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] will not be adopted. The amendment offered by me is offered for the reason it will assist a lot of full-blood Indians who under no circumstances can establish their rights under article 14 of that treaty. Any person who is in possession of a patent can surely establish his rights under the treaty. By the amendment no presumption is raised against the claimants mentioned by the gentleman from Arkansas. If they have the patent and can show that it was given to their ancestors, they will have no trouble in establishing their rights before the Dawes Commission.

Mr. MCRAE. In answer to that, Mr. Speaker, I could with equal force say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] that those who are full blood, if they can prove that fact, will have no trouble; but that is the important question with them. You ask for them what I concede is right and proper as a concession for the full blood. Now, I tell you that by the treaty of 1830 there is no distinction between full blood and mixed blood.

Mr. CURTIS. That is true.

Mr. MCRAE. Those who were upon the roll in 1830, when the treaty was made, and who took lands under it, and they could not have gotten lands under that treaty without being on the rolls. It seems to me not unreasonable to ask the Government to accept the presumption fairly implied by its own records and to relieve these people of any further trouble. The committee has invoked this rule for full-blood people who have equitable and just claims, as I believe, and I make no objection to it as to them, but these other people of mixed blood, if you please, whose ancestors got patents, should be treated in the same way, and I shall insist that they shall be protected.

I am informed that only 7 out of 2,000 who have been admitted by the Commission have ever been able to show patents, and yet I speak for a family, I say, in my own district, whose applications have been filed though never passed upon, and if we are going to make a rule of evidence for one class of people I want to do what I can to see that the rights of my constituents are protected, and I only ask for them what you do for the others.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, there is one point that the gentleman from Arkansas, I think, has overlooked. That is, that there is no doubt about a full-blood Choctaw being a Choctaw. It is self-evident from looking at him. The committee are afraid, if you open the door, that there are a large number of white people pretending now to be Choctaws or the descendants of Choctaws who will make claims. Wherever they can do what the gentleman refers to there is no doubt of their right under the law as it is now.

Under this very measure now pending, if they can show that their ancestors received patents, show that they are the descendants of the Choctaws, who had received patents in 1830, then they are all right under this agreement; but this presumption was given by the amendment of the committee for the purpose of helping out those who were self-evidently Choctaws—Choctaws in blood, speaking the Choctaw language—who are a very ignorant and illiterate people, and who can not prove anything about their grandfathers or their great-great-grandfathers.

Mr. CURTIS. And in many cases the grandfathers did not take out patents.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In many cases the grandfathers did not take out patents and yet they are there. And by the way, they have retained their racial purity to a greater extent than the Choctaws in the Choctaw territory itself. The great overwhelming majority of them are full-blood Choctaws. I think the distinction between the two cases, and especially the distinction of danger and risk to the Treasury, is very patent.

Mr. MCRAE. But, Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman concedes that all the descendants of those who received patents ought to be admitted, he concedes all that I ask.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not concede that.

Mr. MCRAE. I will join you in any effort to keep off from the Indian rolls every man who is not entitled to be there, but when claimants can make this proof by our own records, there ought to be no objection to it. It, in effect, says those who can prove by patents that their ancestors took lands under the treaty are entitled to the presumption that they are Choctaws. There are but few of them not on the rolls.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There are a great many, I will state to the gentleman, who are making claims.

Mr. MCRAE. But they can not prove that their ancestors got patents. The attorney for the Choctaws tells me that out of 2,000 cases acted upon by the Commission only 7 have shown that their ancestors took patents. Now, when the records show who took patents, that should settle it. They do not show all, perhaps, who were entitled to them, but there is no presumption against those; it is only in favor of those who did.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does your amendment simply involve those who can show that their ancestors took patents?

Mr. McRAE. Only those who can show that their ancestors took patents; and it seems to me that common fairness to both sides ought to make this amendment agreeable to everybody. The Indians ought to be willing to accept it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, let us have the amendment reported again. Perhaps we misunderstood it.

Mr. McRAE. That is all there is in it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CURTIS. I withdraw my objection to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I misunderstood the intendment of the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McRAE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer one other amendment which makes that complete, right at the end of the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas also offers the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment the following words:
"Or who is not the descendant of a person who received a patent to land under the said treaty."

Mr. McRAE. It is the same thing, except to round out the last part of it.

Mr. LACEY. How would that then read?

The Clerk read as follows:

So that it will read:
"And shall not be invoked by or operate to the advantage of any applicant who is not of the full blood, or who is not the descendant of a person who received a patent to land under the said treaty."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, on page 39, line 4, after the words "nineteen hundred," I move to strike out all down to and including the word "agreement," in line 14.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, page 39, strike out, after the figures "1900," all of the proviso down to and including the word "agreement," in line 14.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 6, on page 6, after the word "under," the following word, "that," and insert in lieu thereof the word "this."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment on page 6, in line 19, that I send up to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, line 19, strike out the following words, "after thirty days' notice by the Commission, then."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment just reported. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 9, page 7, after the word "Nation," the following: "as provided by the terms of this agreement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 19, page 9, change the word "allottees" to "allottee."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment on page 35.

The Clerk read as follows:

Disagree to committee amendment on page 35, line 6, which is to strike out the words "member of the Choctaw or Chickasaw Nations" and insert the word "persons."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 14, page 39, all after the word "agreement" down to and including the word "tribes," on page 40, line 13.

Mr. CURTIS. I will state, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the House, that we strike it out for the reason that a bill passed last night covered the same subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has already gone out on the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CURTIS. The motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma did not cover that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas moves to amend the committee amendment, as the Clerk has already reported.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 7, on page 50, the words "ten days" and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "ninety days."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment on line 21, page 5 of the bill, and before it is submitted to the House I desire to state that this provision provided for the sale of the surplus lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] to it, as I believe it was he who offered the amendment, providing that no sale shall be made to any one person of more of this land than 160 acres.

What I want to say, and as I am advised, is that the lands that will be surplus lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations when the allotments shall have been made are mountain lands in the southeast corner of the Territory. As I understand, there are probably 50 miles square in the Kiamishee Mountains. I do not suppose there are 160 acres of agricultural land that could be had together on it. As I understand and believe, and as it is represented to me, if they are restricted to the sale of 160-acre lots, it is practically a denial of sale.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask the gentleman, if you are not going to put some reference in restriction to the sale? Might they not sell a hundred thousand acres of this land, which would be valuable for the timber?

Mr. LITTLE. I suppose that would be a good idea, because it is simply an immense mountain tract. It would make a splendid game preserve, and we have heard a great deal about that here lately. I have been on these mountains to some extent, and have some personal knowledge about them. The fact is, I do not see how we can make a limit and make any fair sale. If there is any mineral in the land, I do not know anything about it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will you object to 640 acres, then?

Mr. LITTLE. I will not object; but if the facts are as I understand them, while that will not be as objectionable as 160 acres, if we want to sell the land it is as a large body that the best sale can be made, and it will be left to the discretion of the Secretary. I ask to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "until," page 5, "not to exceed 160 acres to any one purchaser."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question is on the committee amendment that has not been acted upon. I ask that they be submitted in gross.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent, the committee amendments will be submitted in gross. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ALLOTMENTS OF LANDS IN UMATILLA RESERVATION, OREG.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 9501) to provide for the sale of the unsold portion of Umatilla Indian Reservation.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the lands of the Umatilla Indian Reservation not included within the new boundaries of the reservation and not allotted or required for allotment to the Indians, and which could not be sold at the public sale of said lands heretofore held at the price for which they had been appraised, and upon the conditions provided in an act entitled "An act providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla Reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes," shall be sold at private sale by the register of the land office in the district within which they are situated, at not less than the appraised value thereof, and in conformity with the provisions of said act, except that each purchaser of said lands shall be entitled to purchase one section or any subdivision thereof of untimbered lands, and 160 acres of any subdivision thereof of timbered land, and no more; and that residence or actual occupation by the purchaser of the lands purchased shall not be required.

The following committee amendments were read:

In line 6, on page 1, strike out the first word "could" and insert the word "were," and in the same line strike out the word "be" after the word "not."

In line 1 of page 2 strike out all of the bill after the word "act," and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"Provided, That any bona fide settler upon any of said lands who is the owner of substantial improvements thereon, and who has so settled and improved any subdivision of said lands, with the intent of permanently residing on the same as a homestead, shall have a preference right to buy the lands so settled upon by him at any time within ninety days after the passage of this act, upon making satisfactory proof in the local land office as to settlement, intent, and improvements."

The report (by Mr. MOODY of Oregon) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9501) to provide for the sale of the unsold portion of the Umatilla Indian Reservation, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it back to the House with the recommendation that, with certain amendments, the bill do pass.

The amendments referred to are as follows:

In line 6, on page 1, strike out the first word "could" and insert the word "were," and in the same line strike out the word "be" after the word "not."

In line 1 of page 2 strike out all of the bill after the word "act," and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"Provided, That any bona fide settler upon any of said lands who is the owner of substantial improvements thereon, and who has so settled and improved any subdivision of said lands, with the intent of permanently residing on the same as a homestead, shall have a preference right to buy the lands so settled upon by him at any time within ninety days after the passage of this act, upon making satisfactory proof in the local land office as to settlement, intent, and improvements."

The bill as amended will read as follows:

"A bill to provide for the sale of the unsold portion of the Umatilla Indian Reservation.

"Be it enacted, etc., That all the lands of the Umatilla Indian Reservation not included within the new boundaries of the reservation and not allotted or required for allotment to the Indians, and which were not sold at the public sale of said lands heretofore held at the price for which they had been appraised, and upon the conditions provided in an act entitled 'An act providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla Reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes,' shall be sold at private sale by the register of the land office in the district within which they are situated, at not less than the appraised value thereof, and in conformity with the provisions of said act: Provided, That any bona fide settler upon any of said lands who is the owner of substantial improvements thereon, and who has so settled and improved any subdivision of said lands, with the intent of permanently residing on the same as a homestead, shall have a preference right to buy the lands so settled upon by him at any time within ninety days after the passage of this act, upon making satisfactory proof in the local land office as to settlement, intent, and improvements."

Under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1885 (23 Stat. L., 340), certain lands which formed a portion of the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, and improvements existing on certain tracts thereon were sold at auction, in accordance with the provisions and limitations of said act and the amendment thereto by the act of June 29, 1888 (25 Stat. L., 239). In the act it was provided that none of the lands should be sold at less than the appraised value thereof, the appraisement of the same being provided for in said act. The total number of acres appraised and offered for sale was 126,335.46, of which but 33,252.68 acres went under the hammer, thus leaving 93,082.78 acres unsold, and which are unsold to this date.

There was no provision in the act of 1885 that permitted of the disposal of the lands remaining unsold after the public auction, which was held in April, 1891. Various reasons conspired to prevent bidders from buying the lands at the public auction, some of which do not now exist. The unsold lands are chiefly mountainous, being grazing and timbered lands, with a small proportion of good farming lands, much of which, it is believed, can now be sold at the appraised valuation, which ranges from $1.25 to $25 per acre.

Since the reservation was diminished and the sale provided for as aforesaid many persons have settled upon the unsold portions and have been farming them. Neither the Indians, who are entitled to the proceeds from the sale of the lands, nor the Government, in which the title is held subject to the trust, is receiving anything for the lands or their use. By the sale of the lands as provided for in this bill a large quantity of very valuable land would be added to the taxable property of Umatilla County, Oreg., and permanent homes would be provided for a large population.

Under present conditions the occupants of the land can claim no benefit from the county in the way of roads, nor can they secure protection from the State in the quiet occupancy of said land, and the Government can not be looked to for relief in any direction. The effect of the sale provided for by the bill would be to quiet titles and to give the bona fide settler the full protection of the law in securing a home for himself and those who come after him, and would put an end to disputes and controversies over title and occupancy, which now have no forum to which they may be taken and there settled.

The amendment to the bill is designed to fully protect any bona fide settler who in good faith has gone upon these lands with the intent to secure a homestead and who desires to purchase the amount of land allowed to a single purchaser under the original act. Those who have been working portions of the land for the past years and have put improvements upon the land occupied by them should not be dispossessed without an opportunity to first come as a purchaser within the limitations of the law.

It will also be noted that the bill fully protects the rights of the Indians by referring to and being limited by the terms of the original act as to the valuation at which the land shall be sold and the terms of purchase by the private sale herein provided for.

A letter from the honorable Secretary of the Interior and one from the Commissioner of the General Land Office are appended hereto and made a part of this report. The bill has been drawn to conform with the suggestions of the honorable Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 24, 1902.

SIR: Referring to your personal request of the 22d instant, I have the honor to advise you that:

The whole number of acres of the Umatilla Indian Reservation lands in Oregon was 126,335.46 and the total appraised value thereof was $245,624.21.

The number of acres sold at the offering in 1891 was 33,252.68 and the total cash receipts therefor was $220,414.73.

The number of acres remaining unsold, including about 11 acres granted to the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company by the act of October 17, 1898 (25 Stat. L., 559), and for right of way for a ditch or canal granted to the Umatilla Irrigation Company by act of February 10, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 745), is 93,082.78, and the appraised value thereof is $120,560.07. The appraised price of the unsold lands ranges from $1.25 to $25 per acre, or an average price of about $1.30 per acre.

Very respectfully,

BINGER HERMANN, Commissioner.

Hon. MALCOLM A. MOODY,
House of Representatives, United States.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 16, 1900.

SIR: Under date of the 6th ultimo you referred to this Department for report thereon for the information of your committee Senate bill 2210, entitled "A bill to provide for the sale of the unsold portion of the Umatilla Indian Reservation." H. R. 8197, having a similar title and identical in terms, has also been referred to this Department by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives for report, and I have the honor in reply to said reference to submit the following:

Sections 2 and 3 of the act of March 3, 1885 (23 Stat. L., 340), as amended by the twelfth section of the act of June 29, 1888 (25 Stat. L., 239), authorized the sale of a portion of the Umatilla Indian Reservation lands, and also the improvements existing on certain tracts thereof, at the appraised value.

In accordance with the law and the instructions approved March 6, 1891, the lands in question were offered for sale in April, 1891, at the agency on said reservation in Umatilla County, Oreg., to the highest bidder at not less than the appraised value, and in no case at less than $1.25 per acre.

The total number of acres appraised was 126,335.46.

The total number of acres sold was 33,252.68.

The total number of acres unsold is 93,081.78.

The act of 1885, supra, does not appear to contain any specific provisions as to the manner of disposing of the lands of said reservation which remained unsold for want of purchasers at the public sale held in April, 1891.

The provisions of these bills being at variance with those of the original act under which the former sale of a portion of these lands was made, and being also a departure from the usual policy of Congress in disposing of unallotted Indian lands, and no reason appearing for such variance or change, I referred the matter to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the 20th ultimo and directed him to cause an investigation to be made through the agent in charge of the Umatilla Agency at Pendleton, Oreg., as per instructions in my letter of the 20th ultimo (copy herewith).

I am now in receipt of a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated the 12th instant, inclosing the report of the agent at Pendleton, copies of each of which I inclose herewith.

From the report of the agent it would appear that these lands can now be readily sold in quarter, half, or section tracts; that by selling in half or quarter sections more actual settlers, doubtless, would be benefited; that many of the lands are valuable for agriculture and can be resided on, as is evidenced by the fact that they are now largely occupied by squatters.

It would seem, therefore, that good reason exists for departing from the terms and conditions prescribed in the original act of March 3, 1885 (23 Stat. L., 340), and I have therefore to recommend that in lieu of the pending bill the following be substituted and enacted into law.

"Be it enacted, etc., That all the lands of the Umatilla Indian Reservation not included within the new boundaries of the reservation and not allotted or required for allotment to the Indians, and which were not sold at the public sale of said lands heretofore held at the price for which they had been appraised, and upon the conditions provided in an act entitled 'An act providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla Reservation in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes,' shall be sold at private sale by the register of the land office in the district within which they are situated, at not less than the appraised value thereof, and in conformity with the provisions of said act."

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Hon. J. M. THURSTON,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask why they do not sell the land at public sale?

Mr. SHERMAN. I was about to say that the original act provided for its being sold at auction, and not one-half of it has ever been sold. The act made no provision how it was to be sold, unless it was taken in that way, and this bill provides that it shall be sold at the appraised value and the money to go into the Treasury for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. MADDOX. Could it not be sold at public sale?

Mr. SHERMAN. One-quarter of it has been sold and the rest never has been sold. The original act only provided for sale at public auction. This is to provide that the balance can be sold at the appraised value.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ALLOTMENT OF LANDS, ETC., OF THE LAC COURTE OREILLE RESERVATION, WIS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now call up House bill 10698, providing for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians from the Lac Courte Oreille Reservation in the State of Wisconsin.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. SECTION 1. That with the consent of the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior, located on the Lac Courte Oreille Reservation in the State of Wisconsin, to be obtained in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, the President may allot to each Indian now living and residing on said reservation and entitled to so reside, and who has not heretofore received an allotment not exceeding 80 acres of land, such allotments to be subject in all respects, except as to the age and condition of the allottee, to the provisions of the third article of the treaty with the Chippewas of Lake Superior and the Mississippi, concluded September 30, 1854.

The following report (by Mr. BROWN) was read:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10698) providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians of the Lac Courte Oreille Reservation, in the State of Wisconsin, beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill do pass with the following amendments:

First. That the title of the bill be amended so as to read as follows: "A bill providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians of the Lac Courte Oreille and Lac du Flambeau reservations, in the State of Wisconsin."

Second. That the third line on page 1 be amended by inserting the words "Section one" before the word "That;" so that it will read as follows: "Section 1. That with the consent of the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior," etc.

Third. Section 2. That the provisions of section 1 of this act shall also, under same terms and conditions, apply to the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior located on the Lac du Flambeau Reservation, in the State of Wisconsin.

This is a bill providing that, with the consent of the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior, located on the Lac Courte Oreille and Lac du Flambeau reservations, in the State of Wisconsin, there may be allotted to each Indian now living on said reservations not exceeding 80 acres of land.

According to the 1900 report of the Indian agent in charge there are 1,154 Indians on the Lac Courte Oreille Reservation—702 allotments, covering 49,040 acres, leaving 20,096 acres unallotted; and according to the same report there are 795 Indians on the Lac du Flambeau Reservation—458 allotments, covering 36,248 acres, leaving 33,655 acres unallotted.

The passage of this bill is recommended by the United States Indian agent in charge of the Indians, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary of the Interior.

A similar bill, providing for allotments to the Chippewa Indians of the Bad River Reservation, Wis., was approved by the President on February 11, 1901 (31 Stats., 766).

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the title will be amended.

There is no objection.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

NAVAJO INDIAN RESERVATION, ARIZ.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 13875) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all lands claimed by actual settlers or persons to whom valid rights attach, who settled upon or occupied any part of the public lands of the United States prior to the date of the Executive order of January 6, 1880, extending the boundaries of the Navajo Indian Reservation, in the Territory of Arizona, and which were included in said Executive order, are hereby excepted from the operations thereof, and said settlers are hereby granted authority to establish their rights and secure patents for any of said lands to which they have a valid title under the public-land laws of the United States.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, let us understand about this.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this involves but one farm, which belongs to a man that has lived there for a great number of years. Nothing is involved in this bill except this farm that belongs to the man who has lived there, as I say, for a large number of years, and the reservation was extended over his place.

Mr. CANNON. How much land is involved?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Not more than a hundred acres; I do not think there is that much. He has lived on the reservation all these years, and it is recommended by the Department.

Mr. CANNON. Then why not make it specific and provide for his relief? This says, "That all lands claimed by actual settlers or persons."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Well, if there are any more in the same condition, where the reservation has been extended over their places by Executive order, the gentleman from Illinois would not raise an objection, would he, and especially where he has lived on the land for such a length of time?

Mr. CANNON. I would not want to discriminate against anybody unjustly, and still I do not want to encourage the establishment of shadowy claims.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, I know all about this claim, and it is absolutely just and right.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. I will take the word of two gentlemen that know all about it. I did not.

Mr. LACEY. I have an impression that we passed this bill in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We did.

Mr. LACEY. Did it fail in the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. I was under the impression that it became a law at that time.

Mr. MORRELL. I should like to have some information in regard to this land-grabbing bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will give the gentleman from Pennsylvania the information he asks for as to "this land-grabbing bill." There was a gentleman who twenty years ago, or longer, settled on a desert place in the Territory of Arizona. He "grabbed" some land about the size of a small homestead. Long years afterwards, and when he had invested his all in what he had "grabbed," the Government extended an Indian reservation over his place.

Mr. RODEY. By proclamation of the President.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; by proclamation of the President. This man had established his store there and was living in peace and moderate comfort. Now, the Department says that that man ought not to be turned out of that land, which he "grabbed" before the Indians ever had a sign of a claim to it. This is the only case of the kind in Arizona. The Department says that this was a just "grab" on the part of this man. Let me say to my friend from Pennsylvania that I would not try to "grab" land from the Government or from any individual. I am acquainted with the facts in this case, and I know it to be just. The bill is recommended by the Interior Department.

Mr. MORRELL. If the Government has taken from this man what justly belonged to him, then he has a claim against the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Government has not taken it from him; he is still on the land. But he wants his title secured to him.

Mr. MORRELL. That should not dispossess the Indians of their right.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It does not do so, because the Indians never had a right there.

Mr. MORRELL. If the Government has done what it had no right to do, then this man's claim lies against the Government and not against the Indians. He has, as I understand, been placed in possession of this land under a law of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. My friend does not understand the relation——

Mr. MORRELL. I do understand.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. My friend does not understand the relation of the Government as to these claims when we make an extension of a reservation over them. We do not necessarily oust the man at once; but he may remain there with a cloud upon his title, which may eventually turn him out. In this case the man has not been turned off the land. He simply wants to have his title made secure to land which he has held these long years. There is no Indian claim involved. The Indians have never made any claim to this land.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to suggest in this connection that since this Cotton bill first came forward there has been a construction placed upon the extension of the Navajo Reservation by Executive order, in an opinion handed down by Assistant Attorney-General Vandeventer and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, holding that President Arthur's order did not include any of the lands that were occupied and claimed at the time of the Executive order, because there was an express reservation to that effect.

Since that controversy arose a determination has been made of record in a proceeding brought by some claimants of mineral lands, the mineral lands being in the possession of the claimants, just as this homestead was in the possession of Mr. Cotton. Possibly there is no necessity since that decision for action at all, but before that decision was rendered the Secretary of the Interior had put the seal of his approval upon this attempt to quiet the title of Cotton and all other parties that have since then purchased.

Mr. MORRELL. Well, then, let Cotton bring his action in the way the others have brought theirs.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What action could he bring? He could not sue the Government. He can not sue it; there is no provision for him to sue. If the gentleman understood the hardship of this man, he would not make these objections.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say for the benefit of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL] that the gentleman who is living on this place was here this winter in the interests of this bill with the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]; that I know him and his relatives, and have for twenty years last past; that he is the best friend the Indians have; that there has never been a complaint against him in all the years he was near that reservation before they extended the reservation over him, nor has there been since, as the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has well pointed out; that ever since this controversy has arisen the Department has conceded he has a right to his title, and all this bill is intended to do is to give him that title.

He has never had a complaint against him, and my friend from Pennsylvania will find his record clear, and that he is one of the best friends the Indians have. All he wants is this cloud lifted from his ranch—that is, the title to these lands. The Government has no title now against him; he has all but the fee, and the Indians absolutely never had any at all to the place.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman tell us, then, how he got possession of it?

Mr. RODEY. He obtained possession of it in the same way that anybody else could. It was vacant lands in Arizona. That is what it was at the time he went there. He went there and opened a store, stayed there for years, and was proceeding to get his title when they extended this reservation by Executive proclamation completely around him, and ever since he has been entitled to his patent, but for some reason he could not get it issued.

Mr. MORRELL. Why?

Mr. RODEY. I do not know.

Mr. CANDLER. Were the Indians ever in possession of it?

Mr. RODEY. Never.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Indian is not being hurt by this.

Mr. CANDLER. How long has he been there?

Mr. RODEY. Twenty years.

Mr. CANDLER. In peaceable and undisturbed possession?

Mr. RODEY. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. He has been there since 1878.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. RODEY. He is not a man who injures the Indians; he is their friend. He has the best record I think there can be found in the Department for obeying the law and regulations. There is not a drop of whisky around his place ever sold to Indians.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MIAMI INDIANS OF INDIANA.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 8130) for the relief of the Miami Indians of Indiana, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Miami Indians of Indiana, interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum upon the principal sum paid said Miami Indians by act of March 2, 1895, from the time said money, due them under treaty stipulations, was taken from their tribal funds and paid to other persons not entitled to it: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall identify the Indians to whom payments are made under this act, by correspondence or by data in his Department, and forward to said Indians the several amounts due them by checks or drafts.—

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to know something about that bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the report be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be read, in the time of the gentleman from New York.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8130) for the relief of the Miami Indians of Indiana, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment:

This is a bill enacting that there be paid to the Miami Indians of Indiana interest at the rate of 5 per cent on certain sums of money which were paid from their funds to certain persons who were not entitled to any part of said funds. This money was taken from the Miami Indians without their consent and against their protest, and your committee believe that under the circumstances these Indians should be paid interest on the amount of money taken from their funds. The money was taken between the years 1859 and 1867. Just the amount the interest will reach is not known to your committee, but the same will be in the neighborhood of $20,000 and can be computed by the proper accounting officers.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that if the committee can not themselves tell what this is, I do not think we should be expected to know. I would like to have the gentleman give us an explanation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] to explain the bill.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to reimburse the Miami Indians of Indiana for interest on money taken from the Indians unlawfully during the time the money was kept from them. By a treaty of 1854 it was provided that the Miami Indians should have the interest on $200,000 per year until 1880. The treaty provided that none others than those named in the treaty should participate either in the principal or in the interest. This $200,000 they were to have in 1880, and they were to have the interest on that sum at 5 per cent until that time.

Now, in violation of that treaty, first 67 Indians and finally 138 Indians were added to the roll who were not named in the treaty at all. In 1867 those Indians who were illegally put on the roll were stricken from the roll and the principal, to which those named in the treaty were entitled, was paid back to them. But the interest, to which they were entitled for this period, was not returned to them at all.

Now, this bill provides that they shall have so much of that interest as the Secretary of the Interior shall find belongs to them, and it shall be paid to the Indians directly by the Secretary of the Interior, either by check or draft, so that nobody can have anything to do with it at all except the Indians entitled to it, and the bill only gives them what the Secretary of the Interior shall find they are entitled to. That is all there is to this bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. What was the rate of this interest?

Mr. STEELE. Exactly the same interest that was provided for in the treaty—5 per cent. It only gives them the same interest that they were entitled to under the treaty and that they would have had if the money had been left alone and not taken away from them.

Mr. PERKINS. Did they receive 5 per cent?

Mr. STEELE. They received 5 per cent on a part of it, but they did not get what is provided in this bill. It is to be given to them if the Secretary of the Interior finds they are entitled to it.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that this is a bill to recover interest that is due to Indians?

Mr. STEELE. It is interest that was provided for in the treaty. They were to have interest at the rate of 5 per cent under the treaty.

Mr. MADDOX. Under the treaty?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. How do you claim that we owe them anything now?

Mr. STEELE. It belongs to them because the money was taken from them. The principal was paid back to them, but not the interest.

Mr. MADDOX. Who took the money from them?

Mr. STEELE. Indians who were placed on the roll by the Secretary of the Interior in violation of the treaty. Afterwards those Indians who were placed on the roll in violation of the treaty were stricken from the roll, but they had this money and they had the use of it.

Mr. MADDOX. And never returned it?

Mr. STEELE. Never returned it.

Mr. MADDOX. And now you want the United States to make that good?

Mr. STEELE. Certainly; that is exactly what we want, because they are entitled to it. The treaty provided that they should have it. It was a mistake of the Secretary of the Interior in putting other Indians on the roll illegally.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I think that is the transaction, judging by the bill, and I am not sure but I have some shadowy recollection about it. This outrage, if outrage it be, was committed in 1867.

Mr. STEELE. Prior to that.

Mr. CURTIS. In 1859.

Mr. CANNON. From 1859 to 1867.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Now, it seems that in 1895 there was legislation by Congress. We reimbursed these Indians by refunding to them the amount that had been wrongfully paid.

Mr. STEELE. Yes; the principal.

Mr. CANNON. That was the action of Congress at that time?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And that was received by the Indians?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And paid in full satisfaction.

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. If that is so, the transaction is closed.

Mr. STEELE. They did that exactly as they received their annuities every year. They were required to receipt in full each time or get nothing.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Congress considered this nearly a generation after the outrage—if it was an outrage—was committed, and legislated and paid these men back the money that it was alleged they ought to have received before. The amount was received by the Indians and receipted for in full, and now here comes another chip. I think the matter had better be left as it is.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. These Indians being the wards of the nation and the nation being their guardian, do you not think they are entitled to a little more consideration than some white men who have had two or three judgments, which judgments have been paid and receipts taken in full, and yet who come here with claims that are allowed by Congress? Do you not think you ought to treat the Indians a little better than you do the white men?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman, let every case stand upon its own bottom; and I would say to the gentleman, if he wants an answer, representing the great Empire State, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone," and if that is done the gentleman will not cast any.

Mr. PAYNE. If that is so, my friend and no other member of this House will throw a stone at these Indians in this particular case.

Mr. LACEY. The question that is in this case is just exactly like the case of the State of Illinois that we refunded the interest to this afternoon in the deficiency bill.

Mr. CANNON. No; it is not like the State of Illinois or the State of Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. It is just exactly like them; precisely; not only as to the principal amount, but as to the interest.

Mr. CANNON. Congress paid these Indians the principal, and now they are asking for the interest.

Mr. LACEY. Just like Iowa and Illinois.

Mr. MADDOX. Was the claim settled with Iowa and Illinois.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; and receipted for.

Mr. MADDOX. And you come now and get the Government to pay the interest?

Mr. LACEY. It is simply just that we should. These Indians stand upon the same grounds precisely as did Iowa and Illinois on their war claims.

Mr. STEELE. If the Secretary of the Interior does not find that this interest is legally due to these Indians they will not get it.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, Mr. Speaker, the Miami Indians are ably represented by the gentleman now, and by wonderfully able representatives for over a generation, and they have had quite as much consideration from the Government as they are entitled to under the agreement made. I think that the treaty spoken of was a liberal treaty, and the men that received this money that gentlemen think ought not to have received it did so in very right, as much as those who are mentioned in the treaty; and after they had received it and appropriated it Congress comes and repays the amount, as it is supposed, in full settlement, in full consideration, and now comes my friend from Indiana and wants the interest.

I will suggest to my friend that I do not think he can pass this bill to-night.

Mr. STEELE. This is not the only outrage that was perpetrated on those Indians in violation of the treaty. It provided that they were to have the land in common, and yet they put them on the tax duplicates and they had to employ attorneys out of their own funds to take their lands from the duplicates. They constantly had to employ attorneys to preserve their rights. I should suppose that the gentleman would be willing to leave it to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend, if I were a betting character, I would bet a thousand to one that this short report and this short bill, where the Secretary of the Interior does not dwell about a closed transaction, itself condemns it; and I would not be afraid to make a wager when you get a full report on it that it ought not to pass.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the short report to which the gentleman refers was drawn by myself. The reason the report is short was because yesterday I learned that last night and to-night would be devoted to Indian matters, and this matter has been held up for a month or more in order to get the exact figures of the amount due to these Indians from the Secretary of the Interior. They promised to give the exact figures to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] who is on the subcommittee with myself, and the matter was held up. The bill is drawn in such a way that it is a matter of computation for the Interior Department if the bill should pass. Approximately the amount is not far from $20,000.

The Government took this money that belonged to the Indians and paid it over to some people who had no title whatever to it. Subsequently it was ascertained that the wrong parties had received the money. The Government then repaid the principal amount of the money to the Indians, but did not pay the interest, as they were under treaty obligations with the Indians to do; and this bill is simply intended to refund the interest in addition to the principal.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to know the particular reason why the Government did not pay the interest when it paid the principal?

Mr. LACEY. Because the act of Congress was not so drawn. Congress took the matter up and attempted to settle this proposition by paying the Indians back only the principal; in other words, by carrying out a part of their contract and not carrying out the balance to these Indians who are the wards of the nation. We had this afternoon precisely the same question as to the State of Illinois, the State of Indiana, and the State of Iowa. The Government refunded the principal sum due to them without interest.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the New York case said that the State ought to have the interest, and it was refunded to the State of New York. Under that decision Congress, following that, has voted to refund the interest to the States of Indiana, Iowa, and the State of Illinois. Here are some Indians in the State of Indiana who hold valid contracts with the Government to pay them a given sum of money with interest. The Government has paid that contract as to the principal sum, but has not paid the interest. It gave the principal to somebody else who had no title to it. We repaid to them the principal, and now this is a proposition to pay the interest owing to the Indians.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the gentleman that this is a stronger case than Illinois had, because in that case there was a decision of the Comptroller that they were only entitled to so much, and we have overridden that in our legislation this afternoon.

Mr. LACEY. But that was Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. We have overridden it by legislation in February, submitted it again to the Comptroller, and he comes in with the report that they are entitled now to interest because of a decision of the court. There is the great State of Illinois, with representatives to look after her, and here are these poor Indians, who never had a judgment against them by any accounting officer or anybody else.

Mr. LACEY. Now, I want to explain the brevity of the report. It had to be hastily drawn yesterday in order to get it before the present session at all, and therefore it was impossible to recite all the facts. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] is familiar with all of them, and he has placed them before the House. Here is a proposition to try and save $20,000 from our wards, to take some money that belongs to the wards of the nation, in order to reduce the expenditures of the United States of America. The reduction of expenditures is a very laudable occupation upon the part of Congress.

There is no question about that; but the reduction ought to be made on something that is not in the nature of a contract obligation on the part of the United States to pay to somebody what ought to have been paid many years ago. I doubt very much the propriety of saving money in this sort of way. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman from Iowa compares this case to the case of the States. Now, there is this distinction between them: You say this treaty provided for the payment of interest in express terms.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; of 5 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. There was no such express contract in the act of 1861–1862 in reference to the payment of the war claims of the State, and the Secretary of the Treasury construed these acts that interest was not payable. That is the difference between the two cases.

Mr. LACEY. But Congress has resolved that the moral obligation to refund the interest existed and that it bound us to do it; it bound my friend from Illinois.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. LACEY. Now, I hope my friend from Indiana will not be too strong upon the side of economy after what we have done for Indiana this afternoon.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Iowa said that a moral obligation rested on Congress to return that money. I deny that it was simply a moral obligation. It was a legal obligation, and was so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States and the Comptroller of the United States. I object to the gentleman from New York and others trying to play upon these claims of the States in order to get through some scheme in behalf of the Indians.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear the gentleman turn against his own constituents in a matter of that kind.

The difference between the Indiana case and this case is that there was an express contract to pay these Indians and it ought to be done. A suggestion was made that attorneys were looking after this matter. I think this is the only claim for compensation before the Indian Committee in which no attorney of any kind was ever brought in. Absolutely nobody ever came here as an attorney, and it was all carried on by correspondence.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MADDOX. I would like to have the gentleman yield to me. I am on the anxious bench myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. I want to say that I framed this bill so that nobody could get anything out of it except the Indians themselves. I went to the committee and explained the bill and asked them to pass upon it, and if they thought it was right for the Indians to have it to give it to them, and if they did not think it was right to report against them. Is that not the fact, I will ask the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. LACEY. I am sorry to say that that is the fact; that the gentleman from Indiana, instead of helping the committee to look up the bill, presented all the papers to the committee, and said: "There is the case. Look it up." And the committee has looked it up. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MADDOX. I understood the gentleman to say that we ought to pay this interest because the Government promised to pay it by treaty.

Mr. LACEY. I think that is a good reason.

Mr. MADDOX. Does the gentleman think that the Government ought to comply with treaty obligations to the Indians?

Mr. LACEY. Well, I am old-fashioned enough to take that view of it.

Mr. MADDOX. Then why is it that we have continually violated every treaty that we ever made with the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, and the Creek Indians?

Mr. LACEY. Well, that involves too many considerations for me to now discuss. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDOX. We promised to abide by that treaty as long as grass grew and water ran down hill, and we have not done so.

Mr. LACEY. Well, I do not yield for a discussion of violations of other treaties.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like some information about this bill in order that I may vote intelligently on it. How did the Government come to pay this interest under a mistake?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] explained that fully, if my friend had done him the honor to listen to him.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, there was a sort of tête-à-tête discussion going on at the time and we could not understand what was said.

Mr. LACEY. The matter was fully explained. The money was paid to parties who were not entitled to it—who were not members of the tribe.

Mr. WHEELER. How came they to pay the money to people who were not entitled to it?

Mr. LACEY. That is a long story.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, tell it briefly.

Mr. STEELE. In violation of the treaty 138 Indians were added to the number named in the treaty. The treaty provided that only those named in the treaty should participate in either the principal or the interest.

Mr. WHEELER. Who added those 138 names?

Mr. STEELE. They were added upon petition of a band of Indians near Fort Wayne who were not entitled to take anything belonging to the 306 Indians named in the treaty.

Mr. WHEELER. How did the Government come to grant any petition like that?

Mr. STEELE. The Lord knows; I do not.

Mr. WHEELER. What officer was in charge of the matter?

Mr. LACEY. The Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WHEELER. What was his name?

Mr. STEELE. The transaction was so long ago that I do not remember.

Mr. WHEELER. In what year was it?

Mr. STEELE. It was in 1859 when those extra names were first put on the roll.

Mr. WHEELER. When was the effort first made to obtain relief from Congress?

Mr. STEELE. In 1886, I think it was, an attempt was made; it was consummated in 1895.

Mr. WHEELER. How many of those people to whom this interest is proposed to be paid are living to-day?

Mr. STEELE. The money is to be paid to those entitled to it or to their representatives, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WHEELER. Upon what proof is this relief to be now granted? What proof has the Department that this money was wrongfully paid?

Mr. STEELE. The roll will show it. It is not claimed it was paid.

Mr. WHEELER. Who does not claim?

Mr. STEELE. The Secretary of the Interior. The roll shows who were entitled to be paid.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the treaty recite the name of everyone entitled?

Mr. STEELE. Every Indian who was to participate in this fund signed the roll; it was provided that only those who signed the treaty roll should participate.

Mr. WHEELER. How did it happen that the Government made a mistake in paying the money to people who did not sign the roll.

Mr. STEELE. Nobody can explain that. It was a piece of stupidity.

Mr. MERCER. Perhaps I can explain the matter to the gentleman from Kentucky. This happened, I understand, under Buchanan's Administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. I will not say that.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not care whose Administration it happened under. There might be thievery under Buchanan's Administration or under Root's administration. I do not think the gentleman has made out a case sufficient to satisfy the House that this money has been wrongfully paid.

Mr. STEELE. It is a matter of record that those bogus Indians, whose names were placed on the roll by a Secretary of the Interior, and in violation of the treaty, were paid. Their names were stricken from the roll by a Secretary of the Interior, and the interest has not been returned.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman state what proof there is to show that those names were placed on the roll in violation of the treaty?

Mr. STEELE. The records of the Department show that.

Mr. WHEELER. How does the record show that they are not rightfully entitled?

Mr. STEELE. Because none of them are named in the treaty.

Mr. WHEELER. I am unable to follow the gentleman in his explanation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time, there were on a division (called for by Mr. MADDOX)—ayes 70, noes 19.

Mr. MADDOX. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman will withdraw the point I will withdraw the bill.

Mr. MADDOX. With that understanding, I will certainly withdraw the point.

Mr. PAYNE. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill can be withdrawn by unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] asks unanimous consent to vacate the vote by which the previous question was ordered and to withdraw the bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

RED LAKE AND PEMBINA BANDS OF INDIANS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 4962) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Red Lake and Pembina bands of Indians of the Red Lake Reservation, Minn., and making appropriations to carry the same into effect, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk proceeded to the reading of the bill.

During the reading of the bill,

Mr. SHERMAN said: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted at this time to interrupt, I desire to withdraw that bill and substitute another for it. I ask unanimous consent to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to withdraw the bill which the Clerk has been reporting. Without objection this will be done.

There was no objection.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS IN THE STATE OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (S. 4284) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The following amendment, recommended by the committee, was read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That as soon as the cession and relinquishment of said Indian title has been obtained and approved as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause the land so ceded to the United States to be surveyed in the manner provided by law for the survey of public lands, and as soon as practicable after such survey has been made and the report, field notes, and plats thereof filed in the General Land Office and duly approved by the Commissioner thereof the said Secretary of the Interior, upon notice of the completion of such surveys, shall appoint a sufficient number of competent and experienced examiners, in order that the work may be done within a reasonable time, who shall go upon said lands thus surveyed and personally make a careful, complete, and thorough examination of the same by 40-acre lots, for the purpose of ascertaining on which lots or tracts there is standing or growing pine timber, which tracts on which pine timber is standing or growing for the purposes of this act shall be termed 'pine lands,' the minutes of such examination to be at the time entered in books provided for that purpose, showing which of such lands are pine lands and which are agricultural lands, as hereinafter designated, which reports of all such examinations shall be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office as a part of the permanent records thereof, and thereupon that officer shall cause to be made lists of all such pine lands and agricultural lands, describing each 40-acre lot or tract thereof separately, and thereupon such lists of lands shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior for approval, modification, or rejection, as he may deem proper. If the lists thus made are rejected as a whole, then the Secretary of the Interior shall substitute new lists, and the same or original lists as approved or modified shall be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office as the lists of said lands. Duplicate lists of said lands, together with copies of the field notes, surveys, and minutes of examination, shall be filed and kept in the office of the register of the land office of the district within which said lands may be situated, and copies of said lists shall be furnished to any person desiring the same upon application to the Commissioner of the General Land Office or to the register of said local land office.

"The compensation of the examiners so provided for in this section shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, but in no event shall exceed the sum of $8 per day for each person so employed, including all expenses.

"All other lands acquired from the said Indians on said reservations, other than pine lands, are for the purposes of this act termed 'agricultural lands.'"

SEC. 2. That section 5 of said act be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That whenever, and as often as the survey, examination, and lists of 100,000 acres of said pine lands or of a less quantity, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, have been made and approved, the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to sell, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and at such times and places as he may designate, to be scaled under Scribner's rules in the log after being cut, all the merchantable pine timber, whether the same be green or dead, standing or fallen, now on such pine lands, with the exception of 5 per cent of said timber on certain reservations as hereinafter provided, to be paid for when the timber is cut, banked, and scaled in the manner herein provided for: Provided, That said pine timber shall be advertised for sale in Government sections or parts of sections, and shall be sold only by separate sealed bids for the pine timber on each section, and the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve the right to reject any or all of said bids: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may also receive bids in groups of not exceeding 10 sections in any one bid, which bids may be in addition to the separate bids by sections on the same lands.

"The parties bidding shall accompany each of said sealed bids with cash or certified check for 20 per cent of the amount of the bid for the pine timber on any particular section or groups, according to the highest value as shown by the Government estimate as hereinbefore provided for, and said cash or certified check shall be retained and credited as part payment of the purchase price should the bid be accepted, but should the bid be rejected said cash or certified check shall be immediately returned to the bidder: Provided further, That said timber shall not be sold at a price less than $4 per thousand feet board measure for Norway pine and $5 per thousand feet board measure for white pine: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may increase said minimum price on portions of said timber as he may deem just and proper: Provided further, That said Secretary may, if he shall deem it best, permit the purchaser of the timber on any Government section or group to erect a mill of a capacity of not less than 40,000 feet board measure of lumber per day, and to manufacture thereat the timber on said Government sections or groups, said mill to be located on said section or group, or at such place in the immediate vicinity as may be designated by said Secretary; and the said Secretary is authorized to lease to such purchaser not exceeding 320 acres of land for mill purposes, for any one purchase, at an annual rental to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, for a renewable term not exceeding ten years, said term to end, in any event, so soon as the timber purchased shall have been sawed and removed, said lease of land to be exclusive of the timber thereon, which timber shall be disposed of as herein provided for other timber: And provided further, That prior to any sale the Secretary of the Interior shall cause notices of said sale to be inserted once in each week, for four successive weeks, in one newspaper of general circulation, published in each of the following cities, namely: Minneapolis, St. Paul, Duluth, Winona, and Crookston, Minn.; Chicago, Ill.; Milwaukee, La Crosse, Ashland, Wausau, and Marinette, Wis.; Detroit, Saginaw, Menominee, and Bay City, Mich.; Philadelphia and Williamsport, Pa.; Boston, Mass.; New Orleans, La.; St. Louis, Mo.; Albany, N. Y., and Dubuque, Davenport, and Burlington, Iowa, and in the following trade journals, to wit:

"The Northwestern Lumberman, of Chicago, Ill., and the Minneapolis Lumberman, of Minneapolis, Minn., of the sale of said timber as herein provided to the highest bidder, with the right to reject any and all bids, the first publication of said notices to be at least six calendar months prior to said sale, said notices to state the time and place and the terms of such sale, and to contain a general description of the lands from which the timber is to be sold, and shall refer intending bidders to the printed lists to be obtained from the Commissioner of the General Land Office or register of the local land office, as provided in section 4 of this act.

"Said notices shall also state in what tracts or parcels the timber is to be sold: Provided, That one additional notice calling attention particularly to the date of the sale shall be published thirty days prior to the day fixed for the sale in the first advertisement: Provided further, That in cutting the timber on 200,000 acres of the pine lands, to be selected as soon as practicable by the Forester of the Department of Agriculture, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, on the following reservations, to wit, Chippewas of the Mississippi, Leech Lake, Cass Lake, and Winnebigoshish, which said lands so selected shall be known and hereinafter described as 'forestry lands,' the purchaser shall be required to leave standing 5 per cent of the pine timber thereon for the purpose of reforestation, as hereinafter provided, said 5 per cent to be selected and reserved in such manner and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Forester of the Department of Agriculture and approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That there shall be reserved from sale or settlement the timber and land on the islands in Cass Lake and in Leech Lake, and not less than 160 acres at the extremity of Sugar Point, on Leech Lake, and the peninsula known as Pine Point, on which the new Leech Lake Agency is now located, which peninsula approximates 7,000 acres, and in addition thereto 10 sections in area on said reservations last aforesaid, to be selected by the Forester of the Department of Agriculture, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, in lots not less than 320 acres each in contiguous areas, and nothing herein contained shall interfere with the allotments to the Indians heretofore and hereafter made. The islands in Cass and Leech lakes and the land reserved at Sugar Point and Pine Point Peninsula shall remain as Indian land under the control of the Department of the Interior.

"Each and every purchaser of timber hereunder shall be required and shall enter into an agreement to cut clean and remove all the merchantable pine timber, whether green or dead, standing or fallen, on each tract, subdivision, or lot covered by his purchase, except on the forestry lands as hereinbefore provided, within such time as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and to cut no timber other than pine, except such as may be absolutely necessary in the economical conduct of the logging operations, and to burn or remove a sufficient amount of the tops and refuse to prevent danger from fire to the timber left standing, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and, when practicable, to employ Indian labor in the cutting, handling, and manufacture of said timber. And each and every purchaser shall be required to give a bond in a sufficient penalty, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, for the faithful performance of said agreement and for the observance of the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior concerning the sale, cutting, and removal of such timber.

"Before being removed from the tract from which they are cut, all logs cut hereunder shall be stamped and bark-marked by the logger and numbered and scaled by competent and experienced scalers, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and paid such reasonable salaries as may be fixed by him. Said scalers shall keep in suitable books for reference a record of the marks, also a complete list of the numbers of all logs, with the scale of each log set opposite its number, said scale books to be open to the inspection of the check scaler or to any authorized Government representative at all times; and said logs shall be landed separately from all other logs, and the title to said logs shall remain in the United States for the benefit of the Indians; and said logs shall not be removed from the place of landing until the purchase price agreed upon shall be fully paid to such officer of the Indian Department as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Interior to account for and receive the same. And the Secretary of the Interior may, at the request of the chiefs of said bands or tribes of Chippewa Indians of the State of Minnesota interested in the said timber sales, appoint check scalers to verify and inspect the work of the Government scalers; the said check scalers to be designated by said chiefs and paid out of the funds of the Indians such reasonable compensation as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

"After the merchantable pine timber on any tract, subdivision, or lot shall have been removed, such tract, subdivision, or lot shall, except on the forestry lands aforesaid, for the purposes of this act, be classed and treated as agricultural lands, and shall be opened to homestead entry in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, That on the forestry lands aforesaid, as soon as the merchantable pine timber now thereon shall have been removed from any tract, subdivision, or lot, as herein provided, such tract, subdivision, or lot shall, without further act, resolution, or proclamation forthwith become and be part of a forest reserve, the same as though set apart by proclamation of the President in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, and subsequent laws amending and supplementing the same, and shall be managed and protected in accordance with their provisions and the rules and regulations made and to be made in furtherance thereof: And provided further, That on said forestry lands aforesaid said pine timber shall be cut clean, except as to the 5 per centum as hereinbefore provided, and removed under the supervision and direction of the Forester of the Department of Agriculture, in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by him and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and the said forester shall have power at all times to patrol and protect said lands and forests, and to enforce all rules and regulations made by him as aforesaid.

"As soon as practicable after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall open to homestead settlement, as herein provided, the lands on all the reservations, or portions of reservations, which have been ceded to the United States by the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, including the four reservations last aforesaid, which have been examined and found to be agricultural lands, and shall immediately proceed to have examined, as herein provided, the remaining lands, and shall without delay open to homestead settlement those found to be agricultural lands: Provided, That on the four reservations last aforesaid, where agricultural lands are included within or contiguous to forestry lands and are, in the opinion of the Forester of the Agricultural Department, necessary to the economical administration and protection of the same, said Forester shall, as soon as practicable after the passage of this act as to those lands which have already been examined, and as to the lands not yet examined immediately after the examination and approval of the lists of said lands, of which approval said Forester shall be immediately notified by the Secretary of the Interior, file with the Secretary of the Interior schedules designating according to Government subdivisions said agricultural lands, not to exceed 15,000 acres of the lands already examined and not to exceed 10,000 acres of the lands yet to be examined, which said agricultural lands so designated shall not be offered for entry and settlement, but shall become and be a part of the forest reserve hereinbefore created.

"There shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior one superintendent and such assistants as he may deem necessary, whose compensation shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior and for the superintendent shall not exceed $6 per day and for the assistants shall not exceed $4 per day each, while actually employed, and whose duties shall be to supervise the cutting and scaling of the timber sold under the provisions of this act, and to see that the rules and regulations prescribed by the Forester and the Secretary of the Interior are complied with, and generally to perform such services in and about the sale of the pine timber on said lands and the cutting of the same therefrom and the care and protection of all timber on said lands as may be required of them by said Forester and said Secretary.

"The Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, authorize the purchasers of timber hereunder to build on the rivers and lakes on or within said ceded lands, under such rules and regulations as he may deem proper, dams, cofferdams, booms, and to make other river and lake improvements necessary to facilitate logging operations: Provided, That the parties building such dams, cofferdams, booms, and making other river and lake improvements shall pay the officer whom the Secretary of the Interior shall designate to receive such payments such damages as may be caused on the said ceded lands, such damages to be ascertained and determined in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct.

"All the expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act as to the examining and listing of said lands, and the selling, cutting, and scaling of said timber, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Interior out of the proceeds of the sale of said timber: Provided, That no expense arising out of the forestry provision shall be charged to the Indians."

SEC. 3. That section 7 of said act be amended by inserting after the word "lands," in line 1 thereof, the words "and timber."

SEC. 4. That so much of the act of June 7, 1897, entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes," as authorizes the sale of dead timber, standing or fallen, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, on the Chippewa reservations and ceded lands in the State of Minnesota, is hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held in any way to affect contracts already entered into and now in force for the sale and cutting of dead timber, standing or fallen, on said reservations and ceded lands.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior shall proceed as speedily as practicable to complete the allotments to the Indians, which allotments shall be completed before opening the agricultural land to settlement.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to control the time on this bill. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following committee amendment, which I will ask the Clerk to report.

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

On page 18, line 11, strike out the word "Minneapolis" and insert the words "Mississippi Valley."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer another amendment to the amendment, which I will ask the Clerk to report.

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

On page 20, line 25, after the word "timber," insert the following:

"Provided that the Secretary of the Interior shall, upon application, furnish to any persons who may expect to bid, not more than ninety days prior to the date of sale of any pine timber hereinbefore mentioned, a statement of the rules and regulations under which said pine timber shall be cut, and the tops or refuse thereof burned or removed, and of the time within which said timber shall be removed."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, one moment; I would like to be recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I supposed that I controlled the time. I yielded to the gentleman from Kansas. I am entirely willing to yield to the gentleman from Illinois whatever time he desires. I do not wish the time to get away from me, because we want to have a vote on this bill before the time for adjournment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that when he yields the floor for the purpose of an amendment, he yields the floor altogether.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield, as a part of my remarks, time for an amendment to be read for the information of the House, said amendment being proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY]. I yield the time only for information, and as a part of my remarks.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the amendment in my own right, when the proper time comes. I do not think the amendment can be cut off in this manner.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, that is all right. I would inquire what time this session closes, under the order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. 10.30 o'clock.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I have lots of time. Mr. Speaker, I thought a moment ago, while the gentleman from New York was talking, and perhaps he might think the same thing about me now, that words sometimes darken counsel; but here is a bill which has just been read, consisting of 13 pages of the Senate bill, which were stricken out, and then 13 pages of the House amendment, in all 26 pages. It has been read. I would like to call for volunteers. Here we are, with less than a quorum, after an all-day session, at 9.30 o'clock in the evening. How many gentlemen will stand up and say that they have the sign of an idea of what this bill is about.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois will yield to my colleague, Judge MORRIS, or to any members of the committee, say Mr. CURTIS, I am satisfied that they will be able to explain to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Illinois and to all the other members of this House as to the provisions of this bill and as to the necessities for its passage, both in the interests of the Indians and in the interests of the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to know that somebody is prepared to explain, and I should not have taken the floor and been recognized for an hour [laughter] had it not been that with less than a quorum it was proposed to debate this amendment, and I was following the Clerk when he read, and I have glanced over the report, but my eyesight is a little bad, and I began to have a faint idea that somehow or other the timber was to be cut smooth up at the headwaters of the Mississippi River, away up almost to the northern boundary, running down through all our territory and emptying into the Gulf, and recollecting what the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, and other gentlemen have talked about so much here, namely, the great importance for our civilization and salvation, in time, at least, if not in eternity, to preserve at the headwaters of these streams the forests, and understanding how the moss is protected by the trees, and the trees are protected by the water, and the other trees are protected by the shade, and how when the rains of heaven descend—following the eloquent description of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], the chairman of the Public Lands Committee—how they descend and fall and how the leaves and the roots and the trunks hold the moisture in the ground, week in and week out and month in and month out, and how when the dry season comes the water slowly squeezes out and percolates through the roots. [Prolonged laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. And as the water feeds down from the headwaters through the counties and the States, and again through the other States, singing as it goes, and rejoicing the frogs and the grasshoppers [laughter], recollecting all this, I begin to be alarmed lest vandals, desiring to speculate upon pine timber, may cut it smooth and throw these agricultural lands open to settlement, when there are few agricultural lands there, and that our civilization is being attacked by the hand of the vandal, and that on account of dry weather our descendants will cry for bread. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me just for a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the gentleman from Illinois has at least demonstrated that wherever else the moss grows it does not grow on his back. [Laughter.] I think he has further demonstrated that, musical and rippling as are the waters in the streams he has described, they are less musical than his voice and less rhythmical than his felicity in rolling out words.

But, Mr. Speaker, to get at the merits of this proposition, there is now a law providing for the cutting of this timber at the headwaters of the Mississippi.

Mr. CURTIS. All of it.

Mr. LACEY. Since 1889.

Mr. SHERMAN. There has been such a statute for more than ten years, and in the administration of it fraud has crept in, beyond any question, and the Indians have not received what they should have received for the sale of the timber; and because the Department discovered that it was impossible, as they thought, under the existing law, for the Indians to receive all that they should receive, the Department has asked for an amendment of the statute in the terms provided by this bill, which it is believed can be so administered as to protect the rights of the Indians, and so as to have the timber cut and an honest price paid for it under an honest measurement of the amount. Without going into the details, that is substantially what this bill does.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. Is that law suspended now?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is practically suspended.

Mr. MADDOX. And the cutting of the timber is suspended?

Mr. SHERMAN. Suspended by an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill a year ago.

Mr. CURTIS. Two years ago.

Mr. TAWNEY. But they are still allowed to cut under the dead-and-down timber provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. EDDY. No; that has also been suspended.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would yield ten or fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS], so that he may explain the necessity of this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I should be delighted to yield to the eloquent gentleman from Minnesota, sure that the House, as we always are, will be entertained, if not instructed, and we are generally both. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois for what he has said, and I shall not undertake in any way to equal the eloquent speech which he has already made.

If I understood the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, his principal concern about this bill is that it will denude the land at the headwaters of the Mississippi of the timber thereon, and as to that, everybody in the country is interested. Was that the idea I caught from the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANNON. I think that is something that has percolated through my brain.

Mr. MORRIS. Well, that is just exactly what I thought. I thought it was percolating through the gentleman's brain. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill is the only bill that can be passed that will prevent what the gentleman from Illinois is afraid of. Under this bill there will be a forest reserve of 225,000 acres, and other lands reserved from settlement or sale aggregating about 15,000 acres, making in all an area reserved of nearly 250,000 acres—to be exact, 240,000 acres—right at the headwaters of the Mississippi, and by this bill alone can that be accomplished.

There is now, Mr. Speaker, on the statute book a law under which, if it is enforced, and it will be enforced unless some such law as this is passed (it would be the sworn duty of the Secretary of the Interior to enforce that law unless some such law as this is passed), every acre of the timber land at the headwaters of the Mississippi River will be sold to private parties. And every acre of land that is not pine land will be thrown open to homestead settlement and cleared up by the homesteader. If the lumbermen buy this timber land at the headwaters of the Mississippi River they will cut every stick of pine on it.

They will leave the slashings on the ground and fires will begin in these slashings and burn all the balance of the timber, and then the land will be denuded, indeed. If this bill is passed, only the pine timber on 200,000 acres of the forest reserve will be cut, and 5 per cent will be left for reforestation, and all the balance of the timber will be left on that land, such as spruce, birch, and all the other kinds of timber in that northern climate. On the 15,000 acres, to which I have referred, none of the timber will be cut, pine or any other kind. The Forester of the Agricultural Department will make regulations. He will require the lumbermen to clear up these slashings that bring on the forest fires, and in this way the timber lands at the headwaters of the Mississippi River—nearly 250,000 acres—will be preserved. Now, is that satisfactory to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANNON. How much land is to be cut over by virtue of this bill?

Mr. MORRIS. I have the figures here. I give them in round numbers. There are in these reservations at the head waters of the Mississippi River, in round numbers, about 650,000 acres. Nearly one-half of that—no, not quite half—one-third of that is not pine land and will under the law be thrown open to settlement by the homesteader, and the balance is pine land, and of that nearly 250,000 acres will be reserved by this bill, after all but 5 per cent of the timber has been cut from 200,000 acres of it.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not reserved now?

Mr. MORRIS. Not one acre of it now. Under existing law, under the law passed in 1889, the Secretary of the Interior is required to hire estimators to go in there and estimate the pine upon the pine lands. When that estimate is made the statute requires that he shall sell that pine land to the highest bidder for cash, and that sells the pine, land and all. The lumberman that buys that land gets it all.

Under this bill the lumberman gets only the pine, and when he cuts the pine off under such rules and regulations as the Agricultural Department may prescribe, he is to remove the tops so as to prevent future forest fires. He has got to leave 5 per cent of the timber standing, and he has got to so cut it that there will be no further danger from forest fires.

Mr. CANNON. Now, there will be 250,000 acres of permanent reservation of these pine lands?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, nearly; including 25,000 acres of agricultural land reserved in the forest reserve.

Mr. CANNON. Not a foot of that timber is to be cut off?

Mr. MORRIS. All but 5 per cent is to be cut off of 200,000 acres. And as to that which is cut off the refuse from which the fire danger comes has to be removed and destroyed under such rules as the forester of the Department of Agriculture shall prescribe.

Mr. TAWNEY. Five per cent of the pine timber is to be left.

Mr. MORRIS. Nothing but pine timber will be cut out.

Mr. PAYNE. What other timber is there there?

Mr. MORRIS. Spruce, birch, tamarack, and hemlock.

Mr. CANNON. Who is to own this 250,000 acres?

Mr. MORRIS. The Government of the United States will own 225,000 acres and the Indians the balance, the same being held in trust by the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Who owns it now?

Mr. MORRIS. The Indians own it, and the Government is to own it for the Indians.

Mr. CANNON. Hold it in trust for the Indians? What are the Indians to do with it?

Mr. MORRIS. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me——

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. The Indians under existing law get only the value of the pine timber that is on the land.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. The land goes to the purchaser. Under this bill the land is reserved to the Government of the United States for use as a forest reserve.

Mr. CANNON. How much is the Indian paid for it?

Mr. MORRIS. The Indian is paid what the pine brings. That is all that is paid under existing law.

Mr. CANNON. If he owns both the pine and the land and he sells the pine, and we sell the pine and take the land from him, that is pretty bad.

Mr. MORRIS. Under the existing law that is just what happens. Under this bill, instead of the purchaser getting the land the Government gets the land. Now, that is this law.

Mr. CANNON. We occupy it free from any trust now.

Mr. MORRIS. Free from any trust as to the lands on which the pine is. The trust is as to the pine. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois I think there will be a trust in the United States to pay for the 5 per cent of pine left on the forest reserve, and for the pine on the other 15,000 acres, if it should be added to the forest reserve.

Mr. CANNON. What becomes of the three or four million dollars that the United States have advanced to the Chippewas—reimbursable?

Mr. MORRIS. I will say to the gentleman that if the pine is sold under this bill, my belief is that it will bring somewhere from seven to ten million dollars. Nobody knows how much pine is there. My belief is that it will bring somewhere from seven to ten million dollars, and out of that the amount already paid to the Indians will be reimbursable.

Mr. CURTIS. The estimators sent there by the Government say the timber is worth from fifteen to twenty million dollars.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to my friend that I was here when this other act was passed providing for the sale of this timber, and I was here through the years when these timber sharps went up there and inspected and measured this land, and these experts that were there four, five, or six years ago, and now, lo and behold, that all goes for naught.

Mr. MORRIS. I want to say to my friend that that is true as the gentleman says, that he was here when that law was passed. Under that law this pine timber was sold on the estimates made by these "cruisers," as we call them up in that country, estimators, and it was found that these estimates were far below the amount of pine on the land. In all the cases, I may say, their estimate was far below the amount of pine, and that is one of the reasons why this bill is to be passed.

As soon as I saw how that was going, seeing that these lumbermen were getting from the Indians $10 worth of pine, perhaps, where they paid $3, I prepared this bill so that instead of the pine being estimated by estimators, the pine should be cut and every log cut that was merchantable, or that they considered merchantable, should be measured by scalers, and the Indians should be paid for every foot of the timber. That is the object of this law.

Mr. CANNON. Some years ago I was up in this region, and I met a good many people up there. Some white people, some Indians, some Minnesota people [laughter], and some not from Minnesota. Now, then while I was there some of the Minnesota people were talking about this magnificent timber and when the United States would be reimbursed. They discussed all these questions that my friend has been talking about, and then one wise old fellow said: "I'll tell you what: Timber is going to be pretty scarce, and Uncle Sam will keep this timber until we want it and then we can get it." Now, I do not know whether there is anything in that or not, or anything of that kind in this bill.

Mr. MORRIS. That is what this bill is intended to prevent.

Mr. CANNON. I am glad to hear it; but in the light of things that have been done, not to speak discourteously of anybody personally, I will remind my friend of the old saying that we heard when we were boys—that hell is paved with good intentions. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRIS. In answer to that, Mr. Speaker, I will say that I think hell is paved with good intentions, but I think it would be a great sight worse hell if it was not paved with good intentions. Now, do as best we may, all we can do is to do the best we can. I do not know that we will absolutely prevent fraud in this matter, but I do believe that if there is any method under heaven that man can devise which will prevent fraud in the sale of this pine timber the method proposed in this bill will do it.

Mr. CANNON. Now, let me ask one question: Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] hold that same view?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] hold the same view?

Mr. CURTIS. I do; and I want to state further that the Secretary of the Interior and all the officers entertain the same view. It was carefully examined by them, and they are in favor of it.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if my friend will allow me, does the chairman of the committee hold the same view?

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly do.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to ask one final question. Does my friend the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY] hold that same view? [Laughter.]

Mr. EDDY. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I consider the provisions of this bill infinitely superior to the law now in force. I will say further that I should like to amend the bill in some particulars, but if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] occupy all the time, I do not see how I can get an opportunity. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I should be very glad to know how my friend is to get a chance to talk in my hour unless I yield to him. I just wanted a little experience meeting around here to find out, man by man, as nobody was inclined to explain this bill, what there is in it.

Mr. EDDY. That is what I was trying to find out, too.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to have the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] ask some of our Democratic friends—the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] and others—what they think about the matter.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; I should be glad to do so. And I will ask whether the committee is a unit on this matter.

Mr. LITTLE. The committee is a unit on the bill as reported. There is probably some little contention about one amendment; but there is no division of opinion on the proposition that the proposed law is far superior to the existing law, and will be much more beneficial both to the Indians and to the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if I have not accomplished anything else, I have at least secured an expression where it seemed to me a bill was about to be passed that none of us tenderfeet knew anything about; and having taken a poll, I am quite willing, so far as I am concerned, to accept the testimony of these gentlemen, who ought to know and I believe do know; and I am quite content to vote with them. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to get a vote some time to-night, yet I do not wish to cut off any amendments. If I may be permitted to yield for an amendment without losing the floor, I would like to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. With the consent of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY] to offer an amendment and speak upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. EDDY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16 strike out in line 10 the words "only by separate sealed bids" and substitute therefor the words "at public auction to the highest bidder."
At the end of line 16, page 16, strike out the word "seal."

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, the conditions surrounding these Indian reservations in Minnesota are probably without parallel in any other Indian reservation in the United States. The Indians living on these reservations possess millions of dollars' worth of property, and yet are in a condition of absolute destitution.

Many of them have made considerable progress in civilization and are willing and anxious to work; yet with an abundance of work ready for them, with men standing ready to go in and operate in this timber and furnish them with constant employment and pay them good wages, they are absolutely deprived of the means of subsistence.

It is not necessary for me to go into a detail of the condition of these reservations or to take into consideration the law of 1889. I will say in general terms that I am in favor of this bill. But this proposition to sell this timber under sealed bids is an entire departure from all previous practices of the United States Government, with but a single regulation, and that a regulation not provided for by statute. I refer to the Menomonee Reservation in Wisconsin.

Those gentlemen who have been here at previous meetings of the House when Indian affairs were under consideration have noticed that when any of these numerous bills opening up reservations have come before us they have always provided for a disposal of the property by public auction.

There are four classes of people, Mr. Speaker, who are anxious to purchase and operate in this timber. It must be borne in mind that this pine timber is situated differently from any other pine timber in the country. It is surrounded by farming lands. There is a desire on the part of the farmers to go in there and purchase small quantities of land, to erect temporary mills, and manufacture lumber and sell it to their farmer friends and for their own use in the erection of buildings upon their farmsteads.

The second class of people who desire this lumber are the small loggers. They desire to go in there and purchase perhaps 160 acres, or possibly less, of this pine land, and log it on their own account. The third class of people who desire to control this pine and manufacture the pine are the large lumber corporations of Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Michigan.

Now, I am not concerned at all about those corporations. They are perfectly able to take care of themselves under any kind of law that we may enact. They have been able to take care of themselves under any kind of a law that ever has been enacted, and will continue to take care of themselves under any law that will be enacted in the future; but the men whom I am anxious about are the small men.

They not only want the right to bid on this land, but they want the right to know what the other people are bidding and they want the right to raise their own bids, and consequently every one of this class of people—and I have received scores of letters on this question—is anxious to have this timber sold at public sale.

I desire to say in anticipation of the opposition which will be urged against this amendment, namely, the fact that the Secretary of the Interior is very strongly opposed to this amendment, and also that a majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs are opposed to it, but that a very great majority of all of the Minnesota delegation were originally in favor of the public sale, and I want to say further that all the people in the country where this land is situated, or a very large majority of them, are in favor of the amendment, and I want to say when it comes to a matter of the disposition of the pine timber, I think the judgment of the men living in the vicinity of the lands, men who are accustomed to timber operation all their lives, is better than the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior.

I believe that my own judgment, having spent twenty years in the pine woods, is better in the matter of the disposition of pine timber than is the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, who probably was never in the pine woods in his life. Now, the objection urged against the open bids or the public auction on behalf of the Secretary of the Interior lies in the fact that there will be collusion.

He says that if we have open bids and the public auction there will be no collusion. It is possible that there may be collusion, but every single argument which may be advanced in favor of forming collusion at open public sale can be advanced also as against sealed bids. There will not be more than a dozen different corporations outside of the individual small bidders, among whom no collusion can be formed, bidding on this timber.

I would like to have some one explain to me why these corporations could not get together and make an agreement under sealed bids as well as they could on open bids. There is this difference between the two, that if the bids are sealed they are opened by public officers and no one will ever know under heaven, except the officers and the men who form the collusion, what those bids are.

On the other hand, if we have an open public sale and there is collusion and people do not enter into competition with one another, that combination will be patent to everybody who attends the sale, and practically everybody who is interested will attend the sale. I do not believe that it is good business. I do not believe that there is a person on the floor of this House who, if he wanted to sell his household furniture at auction, would advertise in the papers that he would receive sealed bids for the same.

I believe a better price will be received by public auction, for the simple reason that if I bid $10 a thousand in a sealed bid for a piece of this timber I am absolutely precluded from raising my own bid. Suppose there be a public auction, and suppose a gentleman enters into competition with me at public auction, and I bid $9.50 a thousand for that timber. He bids $10, and thereupon I can raise that to $11, and so on. There is another thing I wish to say.

I do not believe that any transaction of the Government, of any kind or character, should be crowded under the cloak of secrecy. I do not believe we should have any sealed transactions on the part of the Government. I believe that an open and public sale will bring a better price for the timber; I believe it is the only kind of a transaction that will enable the small bidder to stand the slightest show of getting any portion of this timber, and I believe it will be better for all parties concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWN] five minutes.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, the question involved in the manner of the sale of the timber under this bill is, in my judgment, one of the gravest importance, and I sincerely believe that if the bill should be amended in accordance with the proposal of the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY], making the sale at public auction instead of by sealed bids, the force and effect of the bill would be lost.

This bill has been given more time and careful consideration than any other bill which has come before the Indian Committee at this session, and I can say that it has received the unanimous support of the committee in all particulars, with this one exception; and I think when this particular matter was brought before the committee there was but one vote against the sealed-bid proposition.

Mr. EDDY. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that at the meeting of that committee there were only nine members present, of whom four voted in favor of the bill, two against it, and the balance did not vote.

Mr. BROWN. Well, Mr. Speaker, previous to that time the bill had been considered by the full committee, with the exception of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY], who was absent, and the bill as amended was reported without a dissenting vote.

The committee have relied somewhat on the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and at this time I wish to read some extracts from a correspondence which passed between the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and also from a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the gentleman state before he reads that letter that this was purely voluntary on the part of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and not at the request of any member of the committee.

Mr. BROWN. I can not say with regard to that, Mr. Speaker, but I presume that it was for the reason that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is very much in favor of the sealed-bid proposition. The letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in part reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, June 9, 1902.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR:

* * * * * * *

I am advised that the members of said committee who oppose the sale of the timber upon "sealed bids" desire that the words "at public auction" be not eliminated, and that the words above quoted be not inserted in lieu thereof wherever they appear in said H. R. 10789.

I am absolutely and unalterably opposed to the enactment of any legislation the provisions of which will permit or require the sale at public auction of the pine timber on said ceded lands. There can not be a single reason advanced tending to establish that the timber should be sold at public auction which does not with greater force apply to the sealed-bid proposition and show the latter to be a more just, equitable, and business method.

If the timber is sold on sealed bids, the bids will be opened in public, and any interested person who desires to be present will undoubtedly be permitted to do so, as well as will, in all probability, newspaper men and others interested in the welfare of the Chippewa Indians.

If the pine timber is sold on sealed bids, competitive bidders will have no opportunity to ascertain the amount of any bid, while if it is sold at public auction each and every bidder present will know the price offered by every other bidder. If sold on sealed bids, competition is invited. If sold at public auction, competition is stifled and the formation of pools, combinations, and cliques to keep down the prices to be paid is invited and encouraged.

This reference in this letter does away with the suggestion made by the gentleman that the bids would be considered in secret by those who were authorized to receive them for the Government.

The Commissioner further says:

It is the duty of the Government to obtain, for the benefit of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, the best possible price for the timber on the ceded lands, and to that end the best mode of obtaining that price should be adopted. I feel positive that the sealed-bid method is far superior in every respect to the public-auction method.

If H. R. 10789 has been or shall be amended, as recommended by this office and the Department, the words "and timber" have been or should be inserted after the word "lands," in line 1, section 7, of the act of January 14, 1889, above quoted.

In view of the foregoing I have the honor to request and recommend that you advise the chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs that the Department believes it would be unwise and detrimental to the best interests of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota to strike from H. R. 10789, wherever they appear, if the bill has been amended, the words "upon sealed bids" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at public auction;" and, further, that if said bill has not been amended by striking out the words "at public auction" whenever and wherever they appear therein and inserting in their stead the words "upon sealed bids" it be done.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. A. JONES, Commissioner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the letter written by the Secretary of the Interior to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs comes out very strongly in favor of sealed bids. In fact, in my judgment, I do not think that the Interior Department would carry the law into effect if it was passed without this provision, for combinations would be formed to keep the price down, and with the powers given to the Secretary of the Interior under this bill he would not sanction sales where fraud could be shown.

The letter from the Secretary of the Interior to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.
Washington, June 11, 1902.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a report of the 9th instant from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, stating that he has informal information that some of the members of the House Committee on Indian Affairs seriously object to the amendment to H. R. 10789, "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota,' approved January 14, 1889," which was recommended by his office and the Department, and provides that the pine timber on the ceded lands on the various Indian reservations in Minnesota shall be sold "upon sealed bids to the highest bidders, with the right to reject any and all bids."

The Commissioner is strongly opposed to the sale of this timber at public auction; holds that if it is disposed of competition is stifled and the formation of pools, combinations, and cliques to keep down the prices to be paid is invited and encouraged, and believes it would be unwise and detrimental to the best interests of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota to strike from H. R. 10789, wherever they appear, if the bill has been amended, the words "upon sealed bids" and insert in lieu the words "at public auction." If the bill has not been amended by striking out the words "at public auction," whenever and wherever they appear, he recommends that it be done and the words "upon sealed bids" be inserted in their stead.

The timber cut upon the Menominee Reservation in Wisconsin has for years been sold "upon sealed bids," after due advertisement, and the prices received are believed to have been better than could have been obtained by sale "at public auction." More competition and less chances for combinations, it seems to me, is had by this method, and I concur in the views of the Commissioner and recommend that the sales of this timber be made "upon sealed bids to the highest bidder or bidders, with the right to reject any and all bids," and that the bill H. R. 10789 so provide.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Mr. EDDY. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin mean to say that if this amendment is passed the Secretary of the Interior would refuse to carry out the law?

Mr. BROWN. The Secretary of the Interior has, I understand, on other occasions refused to carry into effect the provisions of certain laws with regard to this same timber, and being as strongly prejudiced in favor of sealed bids as he is, I am of the opinion that this law never would be carried into effect if this provision was put into the bill, as suggested by the gentleman.

The Secretary of the Interior would undoubtedly proceed to advertise the timber, but in my opinion the sales would never be consummated, for the reason that combinations would be formed to keep the price down, the lands would be parceled out to different syndicates and all elements of competition removed, and the prices offered would be so inadequate that the Secretary of the Interior would exercise the authority given him under the terms of the bill and refuse to accept the offers. As a result the question would again be referred to Congress for practical legislation. According to what I deem reliable information, there is approximately 2,000,000,000 feet of pine timber on the Leech Lake Reservation, 300,000,000 on the Red Lake Reservation, and 200,000,000 on the White Earth Reservation, which, at the minimum price named in the bill, should bring to the United States Treasury, for the use and benefit of the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, from two to twelve and a half millions of dollars.

It seems to me that to put up for sale at public auction the amount of valuable property to be sold after the manner of disposing of a lot of second-hand furniture to the highest bidder is a preposterous proposition. The timber should be sold for what it is worth, and I believe that if the sale is properly handled under the provisions of this bill the Government can realize as much as individuals could with a like amount of property. These Indians are heirs of a vast estate, and the Government is in the position of administrator for them and should proceed on business lines to realize the most possible for them.

In order that the House may be informed as to the provisions of the law which the bill proposes to amend, it might be well to go over the proposed substitute in order to properly explain its provisions. The bill under consideration is reported by the committee as a substitute for Senate bill 4284, and in terms amends what is known as the Nelson Act, which was "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, under which the pine timber belonging to the Chippewas of Minnesota has been partly disposed of for their benefit since that act has been in force.

The Nelson Act has proved to the satisfaction of those who have had the enforcement of its provisions in charge to be entirely inadequate, and has shown conclusively that the interests of the Indians can not be cared for under it. To quote from the Indian agent at Leech Lake, as found in his report to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated August 15, 1899, he said:

Soon after my arrival here Inspector Nesler and Special Agent Jenkins arrived at the agency for the purpose of making an investigation of the conditions existing here, and particularly with respect to the working of the timber operations for the past logging season, which included the logging of dead and down timber only.

A thorough investigation was made by them. As the details will appear in their own reports, I do not consider it necessary to set forth the results here, further than to say that there were collected and turned over to me for deposit to the credit of the Chippewa Indians $55,713.47 as a result of timber unlawfully cut from the reservations. The collection of this money offers, to those who were not by experience already aware of the fact, evidence that the provisions of the law of January 14, 1889, are impracticable and unbusinesslike when put to the test of actual operation.

Section 1 of the Nelson Act provided for the appointment of three commissioners by the President to negotiate with the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota for the complete cession and relinquishment, in writing, of all their title and interest in and to all the reservations of said Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, except the White Earth and Red Lake reservations, and so much of these two reservations as, in the judgment of the Commission, was not required to make and fill allotments, as provided by this and other existing acts. It also provided for taking a census of each tribe or band of the Indians in order to ascertain whether the requisite two-thirds would yield and give their assent to the relinquishment, and for the purpose of making the allotments and payments which were provided for in the other sections of the act.

Section 2 provided for a bond and oath to be given by the commissioners before entering upon their duties, and also named the compensation which they were to receive.

Section 3 provided that as soon as the cession and relinquishment in accordance with the provisions of section 1 was obtained that all of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, except those on the Red Lake Reservation, should be removed to the White Earth Reservation, and that allotments should be made to the Red Lake Indians on the Red Lake Reservation and to all other Indians on the White Earth Reservation. It was provided also that such allotments should be made in conformity with the act of February 8, 1887, entitled "An act for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes."

The bill under consideration does not change the provisions of the first three sections of the Nelson Act in any particular. The committee proposed rather to have the Interior Department pursue its present policy in regard to cession and relinquishment, as well as in making allotments, which we understand is proving satisfactory to the Indians and is regarded by the officials in charge as the best procedure.

The bill, therefore, which is before the House, as far as changes in existing laws are concerned, has to do principally with the disposal of the pine; hence the changes made apply chiefly to sections 4 and 5 of the Nelson Act.

Section 1 of the bill under consideration substitutes for section 4 of the Nelson Act a provision for a survey of the lands, which shall be filed in the General Land Office and approved by the Commissioner, after which the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint a sufficient number of competent and experienced timber examiners, who shall make a thorough examination of the lands by 40-acre tracts. These examiners are to keep accurate minutes of the lands on which pine is located, also of lands where there is no pine. These reports are to be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office as a part of the permanent records of his office.

Copies of these lists are to be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval. These lists when approved are to be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and duplicate lists, with copies of the field notes, surveys, and minutes of examination, are to be filed with the register of the local land office of the district where the lands are located, and copies of the lists are to be furnished to any person applying either by the General or local land office.

This section is plain and specific, and if honest and competent examiners are secured should furnish records to the Department which will be extremely valuable in carrying out all of the provisions of the bill.

Section 2 of the pending bill amends section 5 of the Nelson Act in such a manner as to provide in detail for the advertising and sale of the pine timber, the restrictions under which it is to be cut and banked, the manner of scaling in the log, and provision is made for the payment of logs as banked. This section provides that the pine timber shall be advertised for sale in Government sections or parts of sections, and shall be sold under separate sealed bids for the pine timber on each section, and the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve the right to reject any or all of the bids; and it further provides that the Secretary of the Interior may also receive bids for groups not exceeding 10 sections in any one bid—that is, he may receive bids in both ways on the same lands—and he is then at liberty to accept whichever bid or bids are most advantageous or will bring the most money for such a tract of 10 sections. It is also provided that a payment of 20 per cent in cash or certified check as a guaranty of good faith shall accompany each bid or bids.

In estimating the value of the timber on any tract of land for sale the Secretary of the Interior can not figure the Norway pine timber at less than $4 per 1,000 feet and the white pine timber at not less than $5 per 1,000 feet. It is also provided that the Secretary of the Interior may permit sawmills to be erected on any tract for the manufacture of the timber on the reservations. This provision was inserted in order to give the Indians employment, if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the interests of the Indians would be best subserved by so doing. This section also provides for a wide advertisement of sales in order to secure numerous bidders, and thereby secure competition which will insure the sale of the timber at the highest possible price.

The purchaser is authorized to cut and remove the timber under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and must remove as far as possible the liability of fire destroying the timber by burning or removing a sufficient amount of the tops and refuse, which, if left on the ground, would be a constant danger, as most of the fires which have heretofore destroyed standing timber have started and grown into destructive conflagrations by the burning of refuse which was left on the ground after the completion of logging operations.

It is further provided that all the merchantable pine timber, whether the same be green or dead, standing or fallen, shall be logged under rules and regulations to be laid down by the Secretary of the Interior, and that the logs shall be scaled by Scribner's rule for the merchantable lumber they will produce, this record to give the number, mark, and scale in feet of each log. The scale books are at all times to be open to the inspection of any authorized Government representative or to the check scaler to be appointed at the request of the chiefs of said bands or tribes of the Chippewa Indians of the State of Minnesota.

Provision is also made for the disposal of the lands from which the timber is cut and removed. They are to be treated as either forestry or agricultural lands, the forestry lands to be under the supervision of the Forester of the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural lands to be opened to homestead entry in the usual manner. This bill is presented for your consideration as the composite judgment of the Committee on Indian Affairs. There are a few provisions which some members would have preferred to have eliminated and some which others would like to have had incorporated in the bill. On the whole, it is the best we have to offer at this time. We have studied the question carefully and have endeavored to meet the necessities of the case.

In the judgment of the committee, if due diligence is exercised by the authorities in the employment of honest and competent scalers, and if their work is properly supervised under the safeguards provided in this measure, the probability of fraudulent and dishonest scales will be reduced to a minimum, and if frauds are attempted they can and will be speedily detected.

I sincerely trust, Mr. Speaker, that the substitute bill will pass as reported by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the question involved in the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. EDDY] is a very simple one, and one that every member of the House can very readily understand. There is to be sold for the benefit of the Indians certain property held in trust for them. The question is whether or not it would be more to the advantage of the Indians to have that property sold secretly, by private bids, or sold openly and at public auction.

You will notice on page 15, section 5, or section 2 of the bill—

That whenever, and as often as the survey, examination, and lists of 100,000 acres of said pine lands or of a less quantity, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, have been made and approved, the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to sell, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and at such times and places as he may designate, to be sealed under Scribner's rules in the log after being cut.

These bids must be made, these offers to purchase must be made, for the number of feet in the log—the actual number of feet according to Scribner's scale which the log contains—and then the purchaser obtains his property. Under the present law after the estimates were made there was a public sale, at public auction, of 40-acre tracts of timber at so much per thousand feet for the standing timber thereon.

Under that practice there was no doubt a great deal of the timber that was sold for less than it was worth; but it was the fault of the estimators, and was not due to the fact that it was a public sale. Under this bill the proposition is to sell the number of feet in the log after it is cut. Under this provision or amendment they must necessarily pay for every foot of timber in every log that is purchased.

Mr. MONDELL. Under the present law how is the number of feet on the acre determined?

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the present law the number of feet standing is ascertained by cruisers, as they were called, estimators, who estimate the timber on the ground, and it was upon that estimate the timber has heretofore been sold.

Mr. MONDELL. In 40-acre tracts?

Mr. TAWNEY. In 40-acre tracts.

Mr. MONDELL. So that the highest bidder got the timber, then?

Mr. TAWNEY. The highest bidder got the timber.

Mr. MONDELL. The man who bid the largest lump sum got the tract?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes. The only question, Mr. Speaker, is whether or not it would be, as I said at the beginning, more to the advantage of the Indian and for the interest of all concerned to sell this property at public sale than at private sale under sealed bids.

In the judgment of the majority of the members of our delegation it will, for then every person has an opportunity to bid and there is open competition in the sale of the property, which, I believe, will result in securing for the Indians much more for their property than can be obtained under sealed bids. For that reason I favor the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was brought to the House the Minnesota delegation, every member of the delegation, favored the bill with the proposal for public sale. The bill was amended in the committee to sealed bids by some influences surrounding that committee and some members of the Minnesota delegation with which I am not familiar, not being a member of that committee. They have changed the proposal so as to sell this timber by sealed bids.

Now I recognize that here is ten or perhaps twelve or fifteen million dollars' worth of property to be sold, and, in my judgment, the only fair way to sell this property is to sell it at public auction to the highest bidder. They have provided in this bill that it shall not bring less than $4 a thousand feet for hard pine and $5 for white pine, and reserve the right to reject any and all bids.

I can hardly conceive why any committee, or even the Secretary of the Interior, would want to make a private sale and private sealed bids of property of this kind. In my judgment and understanding, it would be much better for and more to the interest of the people connected with the lumber business, and more satisfactory to me and, I believe, to every member of the delegation in both branches of Congress; and if they were left alone to their own judgment, as they were in the commencement of this bill, they would favor the public sale.

I hope the amendment offered by my colleague will be adopted. I see the chairman of the committee is in a good deal of a hurry, and I will not take up further time. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY] will fail, for it will take all the merit, in my judgment, out of this bill. The great scandal that arose from the selling of the Minnesota Indians' timber came from selling it at public auction.

I have the conference that took place between the Secretary of the Interior and the members of the Minnesota delegation, and the gentleman from Minnesota stated that the chief objection in selling the timber is in selling the timber at public auction. He further stated "I would have him confer these contracts on the highest bidders on sealed bids, reserving the right to reject any and all bids." He said there were four things that ought to go into the bill. One was that timber should be sold on sealed bids.

Now, if the timber of the Chippewas is to be sold for the sole benefit of the lumbermen of Minnesota, then the amendment should prevail. If it is to be sold for the best interests of the people of the entire United States and for the Indians, the provision of the committee should be kept there, and this amendment should be voted down. I hope the House will stand by the committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FLETCHER) there were 22 ayes and 47 noes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report is agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. What is the proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It arose on the conference report, which has been agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL PLANTS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5718) providing for the sale of sites for manufacturing or industrial plants in the Indian Territory.

The amendment was, on page 2, line 18, after "tribe," to insert:

The clerk of the United States court for the southern district shall appoint deputy clerks for the courts at Tishamingo and Ada. That in addition to the places now provided by law for holding court in said district, court shall be held at Duncan, and all laws regulating the holding of court shall be applicable to Duncan.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

AGREEMENT WITH CREEK INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4923) to ratify and confirm a supplemental agreement with the Creek tribe of Indians, and for other purposes, which were, on page 6, line 15, after the word "tribe," to insert:

Provided, That the Dawes Commission be, and is hereby, authorized to add the following persons to the Creek roll: Nar-wal-le-pe-se, Mary Washington, Walter Washington, and Willie Washington, who are Creek Indians, but whose names were left off the roll through neglect on their part.

On page 7, line 25, after the word "site," to insert:

Under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That such citizens may purchase any of said lands in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 1, 1901 (31 Stat L., 61): And provided further, That the lands which may hereafter be set aside and reserved for town sites upon recommendation of the Dawes Commission as herein provided shall embrace such acreage as may be necessary for the present needs and reasonable prospective growth of such town sites, and not to exceed 640 acres for each town site.

On page 9, line 18, to strike out the word "hereunder;" in line 22, after the word "the," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "deed therefor" and insert "approval of this supplemental agreement;" on page 10, line 8, to strike out the word "herein;" in line 24 to strike out down to and including "Creek lands," and in line 20, page 11. to insert:

17. Section 37 of the agreement ratified by said act of March 1, 1901, is amended, and as so amended is reenacted to read as follows:

"Creek citizens may rent their allotments, when selected for strictly non-mineral purposes, for a term not to exceed one year for grazing purposes, only and for a period not to exceed five years for agricultural purposes, but without any stipulation or obligation to renew the same. Such leases for a period longer than one year for grazing purposes and for a period longer than five years for agricultural purposes, and leases for mineral purposes may also be made with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and not otherwise.

"Any agreement or lease of any kind or character violative of this paragraph shall be absolutely void and not susceptible of ratification in any manner, and no rule of estoppel shall ever prevent the assertion of its invalidity. Cattle grazed upon leased allotments shall not be liable to any tribal tax, but when cattle are introduced into the Creek Nation and grazed on lands not selected for allotment by citizens, the Secretary of the Interior shall collect from the owners thereof a reasonable grazing tax for the benefit of the tribe, and section 2117 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not hereafter apply to Creek lands."

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 105) supplementing and modifying certain provisions of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 9501) to provide for the sale of the unsold portion of the Umatilla Indian Reservation;

A bill (H. R. 10698) providing for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians of the Lac Courte Oreille and Lac du Flambeau reservations in the State of Wisconsin;

A bill (H. R. 13172) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 13875) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona.

The bill (H. R. 15108) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State covering a statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company for the month of December, 1901, furnished by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Commission, in pursuance of section 11 of the "act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana territory," etc., approved March 3, 1901.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, June 19, 1902.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me one moment, not to make any remarks at all?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I move an amendment to the bill, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert what I send to the desk. It may lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to have the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin one moment. I should like to move the amendment which I have proposed to the bill, at some time, either before or after the vote has been taken upon his amendment. I do not know at present whether one might be added to the other, but I should like to have it understood that the parliamentary rule that you can not move to amend a substitute or an amendment, which has already been adopted, shall not be applicable. I think it will serve the convenience of the Senate. Suppose the Senator's amendment should be adopted by the Senate as preferable to the bill, then I should like to have the opportunity still to propose mine. I want to put myself on record upon it, and there are other Senators I know who agree with me.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator's amendment would be in order as an amendment to my proposition, and supersede it, if adopted, would it not?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; but perhaps the Senate might order a vote on the Senator's proposition before my amendment was proposed.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not care for that. If the majority of the Senate is in favor of the Senator's proposition it may be developed as early as possible.

Mr. HOAR. If I can have unanimous consent that my amendment may be moved without being liable to the objection that it is an amendment to matter already adopted I should like it.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Could not the Senator from Massachusetts offer it as an amendment even though the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin were adopted? Could he not offer it after the amendment had gone into the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. Possibly; but I am not quite sure. If the amendment goes into the Senate, being adopted in Committee of the Whole, then the same question arises. If I should then offer my amendment the objection would be, "You are proposing an amendment to something already adopted by the Senate, and you can not do it under the parliamentary law." I should like to be able, in spite of the parliamentary rule, if there is no objection, to propose it in the Senate. I think that would be a more convenient way of getting at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator?

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the request is that whatever amendment shall be adopted in Committee of the Whole may be modified in the Senate by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senate see fit.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senate see fit.

Mr. HOAR. Notwithstanding the amendment should have been adopted also in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into a general discussion of the relative merits and demerits of the proposed isthmian routes under consideration in this body; this has been ably done on both sides, but simply to submit a few observations and general deductions from the great mass of data and information that have been presented, which have influenced my mind in arriving at a conclusion as to how I should vote on this important question.

If one-half of the objections that have been urged against both propositions had any foundation in fact, our duty would seem to be plain in rejection of them both.

I am, however, inclined to the belief that lack of study of available information, coupled with more or less prejudice and partiality, and possibly some hostility to every canal scheme, have given rise to considerable exaggeration as to difficulties, and while interoceanic canal construction to successful completion on this continent is somewhat experimental, yet I believe that the consensus of conservative opinion warrants the conclusion that all physical obstacles and engineering difficulties in the one case, and perhaps in both cases, may be ultimately overcome, and that a great waterway of the nations connecting the two mighty oceans may within the next decade of years become a fait accompli.

In the light of the example and successful results which the Suez Canal affords us, viewed from both a strategic and financial standpoint, it is not a matter of great surprise that throughout this nation there has been awakened a keen desire, amounting to an almost universal demand among people of all classes and avocations, that such a canal should be constructed with all possible dispatch.

The people of this country want a canal, and they are determined to have it. You may delay it, but you can not defeat it.

This sentiment has been expressed with great emphasis in nearly all State and national conventions of both great political parties, in memorials of legislatures, in resolutions of chambers of commerce and other commercial, industrial, and financial organizations, and generally by the press all over the land; and any political party that attempts to compass its defeat or purposely delay its construction must surely go down to defeat.

This widespread and deep-rooted purpose of the people is fully reflected in this Congress, and is apparent from the fact that it is well known that there are powerful individual and corporate influences actively at work to resist by every possible expedient the inauguration of this great enterprise.

It is fair to assume that in one or the other, and probably in both Houses of Congress, there are members who in a legitimate and honorable way are somewhat susceptible to such influences, and who, nevertheless, recognizing the force of the prevailing public opinion, have not the courage to openly disregard it by direct opposition to all canal projects.

If I am not misinformed, however, some few Senators have frankly acknowledged that in giving support to the Panama route they could best give expression and force to their desire that no legislation should be accomplished, and I refer to this without for a moment desiring to impugn the motives of a single Senator, for a higher minded, more dignified, or more intelligent body does not exist anywhere on earth, but simply to illustrate the force of public opinion on this subject.

Mr. President, we are confronted here with a display of maps and comparative statistics of construction and operation, with data as to the relative climatic, meteorologic, sanitary, and physical conditions prevailing on the respective routes that are somewhat confusing and perplexing, and when doctors differ it is not always easy for a client or layman to arrive at a correct conclusion; but I feel it incumbent upon myself in the interests of the people whom I have the honor to represent, after a careful study of all available information, to support that project whose more general and important features I believe to be the most feasible, and which at the same time, in consequence of prompt and predominant action in the House of Representatives, seems to have the only chance of being put into execution, feeling the utmost confidence that the details thereof will be satisfactorily worked out, and hence I will support the Nicaragua plan.

Mr. President, I am prompted to this decision likewise because I believe national considerations demand that a canal shall be built, and built as speedily as possible. I consider this project to be so grand, so magnificent, and so powerful as a factor in the enlargement and expansion of the industrial, manufacturing, and commercial interests of this nation that no selfish and subordinate interests should be allowed to stand in the way of its consummation.

I can not believe that its operation would be a disturbing or a prejudicial factor to any corporate or State industries, nor detract from the welfare of any of our cities. On the other hand I believe it will be helpful and contributory to them.

I am aware that the managers of our transcontinental railway systems and some people in our seaport cities are apprehensive of competition and diversion of trade, but I believe they will discover that the canal, when in operation, will create much more business than it will divert from them, and, directly or indirectly, all will reap advantages therefrom.

Mr. President, from all that has been said and written on the subject of concessions and titles and invested rights, I am convinced that the Nicaragua scheme is much less involved than the Panama, and that the local conditions there are more favorable, Its closer proximity to our ports, and freedom from calm belts, which renders it available to sailing vessels, and its healthful climatic surroundings give it advantages which more than compensate for any additional time required in passing through it.

From my observations as to dam construction and knowledge of disastrous loss of life and property in the West by reason of dams giving away that had been constructed by competent hydraulic engineers, but who lacked information as to the character of supporting foundations, I entertain serious misgivings as to the possibility of constructing the proposed dam at Bohio to resist the enormous pressure to which it would be subjected. This has been carefully and fully adverted to in the able speech of the Senator from Kansas, who is a practical engineer. Should it fail, the results would be disastrous, and as this would probably not be determined until the canal would be completed, it would mean absolute failure of the whole project.

One thing may be truthfully said, Mr. President, that no engineers or commissioners have ever pronounced the Nicaragua plan impracticable, and all have concurred in its feasibility. The engineers who were sent down under President Grant's Administration to examine and survey all practicable routes reported the Nicaragua route as preferable to all others. At that time the French company had not taken hold of Panama.

The last Commission reported in its favor without any qualifications whatever touching the price at which the Panama Company's interests might be acquired.

If we accept the Nicaragua route we get it with a clean bill of health, unencumbered with contingent or reversionary interests and without entangling legal complications, and beyond the reach of sanguinary conflicts of a revolutionary and lawless people that will be a continual and probably perpetual menace to property rights in the State of Colombia.

The disastrous experience of the French in their attempt to construct a canal at Panama should serve as a wise example for us. It has been a veritable human as well as financial graveyard, and now it is proposed that we shall undertake to vitalize the hideous wreck.

My experience in life has taught me that only disaster awaits him who attempts to reconstruct upon foundations that have brought havoc and ruin to others. It seems unwise that this nation should undertake to revivify this hideous moribund, whose brief existence has left a heritage of ruin, dishonor, and desolation.

Mr. President, the Panama Canal is a "hoodoo," to be shunned and avoided.

We should devote our energies to the new and clean Nicaragua proposition, which will inspire our people with courage, pride, and hope, and stimulate a speedy completion of an essentially distinctive American enterprise that will command respect for our flag and enlarge our prestige all over this globe. The recent brilliant but tragic exhibition of nature's awful forces which Mount Pelee has displayed has given the champions of the Panama route an opportunity to appeal to timid minds by suggesting possibilities of similar catastrophes on the shores of Nicaragua Lake. There are extinct volcanoes in Montano, Idaho, and other Western States. In Washington and Oregon there are some that show signs of animation. Should all neighboring enterprises be suspended and cities stop building in terror of them?

Cyclones sweep our Western States and leave death and destruction in their pathway. Do the surviving inhabitants abandon their farms and habitations? On the ruins of Herculaneum, destroyed two thousand years ago, stands the city of Portici with 25,000 inhabitants.

The entire isthmus region is subject to seismic disturbances, and so far as the two routes in question are concerned, the honors are perhaps easy, and should it ever occur that one of the old craters so graphically alluded to by the Senator from Ohio should undertake to emulate the example of Pelee, and it should result in the closing of a few miles of canal, it were better to take chances of having to make some repairs once in a thousand or five thousand years than to be subject to the daily and constant death-laden exhalations that issue from the fever-cursed swamps of Panama.

Now, Mr. President, in conclusion I appeal to all those who are about to vote on this proposition, if they have any hope or desire to see any canal built, to support the Nicaragua plan. Pass that bill, and in three days it will become a law, and preliminary arrangements to begin work will commence.

Pass the Panama bill, and all legislation on this subject will be blocked for years and possibly for all time. The eyes of this nation are turned upon this body in anxious expectation to-day. Do not disappoint them. Every consideration of patriotism and of public and national policy prompts the undertaking. It may not inaugurate a new era of prosperity, but it will initiate innumerable new enterprises and give a new impetus to those already established and add new luster to the glory of the nation.

[Mr. ALLISON addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, when I become antagonistic in opinion with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], I always feel that I am not only opposed by an honorable and able statesman, one of our greatest men, but that he will present candidly and fairly all of the arguments to sustain his view on any subject that is brought up, and so the country regards him. Notwithstanding the impressiveness with which the Senator has uttered his opposition to the House bill this morning, I do not feel the alarm in replying to him that I would ordinarily feel, for the reason that he has been with me—I remember that very well and am very grateful therefor, too—during many years in the advocacy of the Nicaragua route, and he has found an occasion—I might almost say a temptation—to leave that route and take up the Panama route, and this is his ground of complaint against me, if he has any at all, that I do not follow him in that new departure.

I am entirely satisfied to have had the Senator's recommendation and his vote and his assistance all this time; indeed, I have rejoiced at it. Now, if the Senator and I were differing as to any single material fact, if there was a fact that could be stated about which we differ in arriving at our conclusions, I would feel that I ought to take up that particular fact and discuss it and try to convince the Senate and the honorable Senator that he is mistaken in the fact. But we agree absolutely upon all the facts, every one, which relate to engineering, to the measurement of the canal, the locks, curves, the distance to be traversed, and all that. The Senator draws some deductions from those facts which I think are not sustained by the Isthmian Canal Commission at all. I have not challenged the statements of any of the commissioners. I have not in the slightest degree challenged their character or reputation. I have based my whole action in this matter—I speak of mine; my colleagues on the committee agree with me in that—entirely upon a concurrence in all the statements that the Isthmian Canal Commission have reported to the Congress of the United States during this entire proceeding where they have made any statements of facts.

The issue has come down to a certain point, a single, solitary point, about which I contend that the Senator from Iowa would be a much more important expert than any gentleman on that Commission, and perhaps any gentleman on our own committee, some of whom are greater experts in finance than any member of the Isthmian Canal Commission. I do not understand that the members of the Commission have any particular reputation as financiers, nor do I understand that the service in which they have been engaged inclines them to ideas of economy in expenditures, either as naval officers or as engineers or as lawyers or as political economists.

So, when the Senate referred this question to the committee, we thought we had something to do. We thought we were at liberty to consider the question, and if we came to a different conclusion upon the question of finance, the question of money, from the Isthmian Canal Commission, that we would not be rebuked for presenting our views on the subject to the Senate. While we perhaps have no right to set ourselves up as experts in finance—I am sure I am not in the slightest degree an expert on finance, except in being very expert in getting rid of the finances that have come to my pocket—at the same time there are Senators on the committee who are experts in finance, and greatly successful, and I would take the judgment of the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT], who is a member of that committee, before I would take that of any man on the Commission in respect to any financial proposition connected with this subject or any other subject, and so would the people of the United States.

The Senator from Iowa commenced in rather a despondent strain on the subject of raising the money for the canal. I thought it was one of the glories of the American people that we, with absolute security and sincerity, could say that we were the only people in the world who could go into our own Treasury and find the money to build the canal, and I have even been led to suppose by the reports that have come from time to time in regard to the surplus of our receipts over our annual expenditures, the accumulation of money in the Treasury—and the Government is really troubled about getting rid of it at times—that there was no difficulty at all in the future financial propositions in connection with the canal. And I think so yet.

I think the Senator's misgivings in regard to the necessity for issuing bonds are not well founded at all, and if I should tell the honorable Senator that I know an engineer in the United States who can give security, the best in the world, for the completion of this canal, and who is willing to take the contract for $146,000,000, on the plans of the surveys of the Isthmian Canal Commission, perhaps it might surprise him a little. I have no authority to make the statement in open Senate, so as to give the name of the gentleman, but I will inform the Senator from Iowa if he wishes to know who it is. He is a man of the highest character. There is another man who is willing to take the canal and construct it for a ten years' lease of it after the canal is in operation. So I think we are worrying ourselves unnecessarily about the future.

At all events, the canal is going to be some time in construction according to the computations of all engineers on either route. It will take perhaps two years to establish the plant. They all seem to understand perfectly well that a resurvey of the Panama route is absolutely necessary in order to install the American system of canal work. The Commission distinctly report that the machinery and appliances on the Panama Canal now are of no value whatever, and would not be of any value to an American contractor, and that he had better install his plant without reference to them than to take them as a free gift and try to use them.

I was satisfied with that declaration of the Commission, and I thought everybody else ought to be. So the installation of the plant is to be de novo, not to be patched up on the back of something there now. We are to discard all that, and in my opinion if we are wise about it we will burn up those houses and try to get rid of the yellow-fever microbes that are nesting in them, and start with a new lot of cabins or tents, or something of that kind. But that is not a matter of importance.

If it should cost us a thousand million dollars to build the canal it is worth it in a political sense to the United States Government for the purpose of creating that bond of union which nothing else can create—commerce—between the different parts of the American Union. I venture to say that if in 1860–61 the railroad system of the United States had been as complete as now the likelihood is we would not have had that great civil war, because we would have understood each other better and our commerce and our interests would have been more interlaced. There is not a more important politico-economic feature of this whole canal than the bringing of the east and west coasts of the United States into rapid commercial connection.

When we had projected, aided by the United States, that great line of Union and Central Pacific Railroad across the continent and astonished the world with the marvel of its rapid completion, we supposed we had accomplished all that the American Government would ever be expected to participate in or that the people would ever attempt to do in building transcontinental railroads.

Now, how many lines have we across the continent? Six or seven. I do not know how many exactly. But men are now projecting new lines across the continent out of their own private purses and by private combinations, without ever thinking of the United States Government. What is doing this great work? It is the necessity of the situation—not political, but commercial—which causes this enormous increase in the railroads across the continent. They will go on. Others will be built. They will be built with private money. No man will ever be here for the purpose of getting an indorsement of bonds or a grant of land for another railroad. Mr. Hill built the Great Northern Railway, I am informed, without a dollar of assistance from any government whatever, and he is working to defeat any canal that will compete with him.

They will go on and are going on, but the unfortunate part of it is that they are all very close kin to each other, and it is the easiest thing in the world to make combinations with each other—I have proven undeniably that they have made such combinations—and there are a class of people in the United States who have not any money, who have nothing but labor and perhaps land upon which to subsist, who need the assistance of this Government to furnish cheap transportation by waterways to be built by the Government in competition with these great roads, so that the railroads shall not have the absolute monopoly of the transportation of all that passes between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

That is the great problem. So I think after stating it I can well say that the Government of the United States could well afford to pay a thousand million dollars to establish a route of this kind if it were necessary to do so. But the waterway we are trying to establish is absolutely cheap. A million dollars a mile has become almost a standard price for the construction of canals throughout the world. The Suez Canal cost that, and the Chicago Drainage Canal cost $1,000,000 a mile. The Manchester Canal cost a little more than that. The Kiel Canal cost still a little more than that, because it was made deeper and wider. But for a canal 30 feet deep and a hundred feet wide I will say a million dollars a mile is the calculation, and it works out right in building canals. It is a hundred and eighty-three miles from Greytown to Brito. The report is a hundred and eighty million dollars to build the canal. If left to private enterprise the man who builds it for that sum will make $30,000,000 clear money on the estimates of the Commission.

So these undertakings, while they are altogether impressive and magnificent in the contemplation of the purposes they will serve, are not at all to be compared with the sort of expense that men have to undergo even to build railroads across the great Rocky Mountains and the Sierras between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. If the money it cost to build any one of the great transcontinental railroads was applied to the Nicaragua Canal, or to the Panama Canal, if it can be built at all, which I doubt very much, it would build the waterway on any reasonable plan.

Now, do we owe it to the people of the United States to do this work? Here we voted the other day, sir, for a bill that you, Mr. President [Mr. FRYE], reported to this body. I think it covered about $80,000,000, if I am correctly informed, for the internal waterways of this country, out of which no toll is to be collected from anybody. It is entirely for the benefit of commercial men and producers and manufacturers, and it is the duty of the Government to do it. We are all eager to bestow these moneys upon internal improvements. Why are we startled when we are trying to lay out a line of communication between these oceans for the benefit of the whole body of the people, including the sailing ships, I will take the liberty to observe?

So I do not accept the alarm which the Senator from Iowa seems to feel on this occasion as being very seriously indulged, particularly in a Congress where we vote a billion of dollars, I believe, now at every session. We do not do it because we are unnecessarily extravagant or wasteful. We do not have any jobs. We do not pay, perhaps, in many instances, as large salaries as men ought to have for the work they do. But here is a great and growing country, growing so fast that we can not keep observation of it. A man might almost as well study one of the great planets as the United States for the purpose of accurate information of its movements and its growth and expansion. The most astonishing, and at the same time the most comforting reflection that can be made is that it has no water in it and no wind in it. It is all solid, good work. It comes from our institutions and our people. They happen to be very well suited to each other, and, taken together, are the strongest combination ever made in the world.

So I can approach this question, Mr. President, notwithstanding the alarm of the Senator from Iowa, with quietude and with satisfaction that we are not going to involve the Government of the United States in any extraordinary expense which it can not meet. We have all the time we want to put up the money, because it is our canal and under our control, and we are building it and we certainly will know how fast we can supply the money for it. It will not be a tax upon us.

Now, one other view of it. Suppose we should try to make the use of this canal that is made of the Suez Canal by Great Britain and by the other stockholders as a money-making investment. Great Britain, not having a majority of the stock, but a large interest, has made an immense sum of money in the purchase of Suez Canal stock. The Suez Canal has declared for the last decade from 15 to 19 per cent net dividends from the income of the canal, after taking out all expenses, and they have been very busy in widening their canal so as to prevent that which will take place at Panama if we build the canal on the present plan.

They are having vessels jammed in there that can not pass each other. They can not get through fast enough. They are spending a great deal of money for that, but here is 15 to 19 per cent during the last decade. What is the stock worth that Disraeli bought at par from the Khedive of Egypt? What is it worth on the Bourse at Paris or the stock exchange in London? It is worth 800 per cent. Take the quotations and you will see how it is. I am not exaggerating anything. It is worth 800 per cent.

When the Sault Ste. Marie Canal rises from 6,000 tons of shipping the first year of its operation to 36,000,000 tons in the last report, with three great parallel railroads to assist in the transportation of the production of a small area of country that uses the canal, we can understand that canals will be needed upon canals in order to accommodate the commerce of this country.

When this twin Mediterranean in the south, divided by Cuba and Porto Rico, has had the opportunity of being settled around its coasts when they are brought in contact with actual commerce, what will be the production? Who can estimate the future productiveness of the great valley drained by the waters of the Mississippi River? That river debouches into the Gulf of Mexico, almost into the mouth of this canal. It is not a poetic license at all, but it is a truth that when this canal is built it will open a new mouth from the Mississippi River into the Pacific Ocean. I will not dwell on that. It is rather an attractive subject to me, but I have other business to attend to this morning which I am obliged to pursue.

Mr. President, this morning I had read the letter from the Secretary of State announcing that Costa Rica had agreed to sign, substantially and without any sort of hesitancy, the convention that Mr. Hay himself prepared and sent there for examination. That paper is here now and is being translated from the Spanish text. The difficulties that Costa Rica has had are simply a construction of her constitution, and I commend to all the gentlemen who have had anything to do with the matter that Costa Rica has so carefully considered whether, in the signing of this paper, they would make any violation of their constitutional law. They have either ascertained that they would not, or else they have made the necessary modification of the constitution. Here is the paper; and as it is the first time it has been in the Senate, I desire the Senate to know the terms upon which Costa Rica is willing to complete the contract she made with Mr. McKinley. I ask that it may be read at the desk.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me? What is the paper?

Mr. MORGAN. It is the paper prepared by Mr. Hay and sent to Costa Rica, and I read this morning the communication from the Secretary of State——

Mr. SPOONER. I remember it.

Mr. MORGAN. Stating that the Costa Rican Government has agreed to accept it, substantially.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

Mr. MORGAN. I would be glad if Senators would listen to the paper, because it is very important.

The Secretary read as follows:

Canal convention between the United States and Costa Rica. Draft amended February 14, 1902.

The United States of America and the Republic of Costa Rica, being desirous to assure the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, have for that purpose resolved to conclude a convention, and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, ————;

The President of the Republic of Costa Rica, —— ——,

Who, after communicating to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The Republic of Costa Rica concedes to the United States the exclusive right to construct, own, and operate a ship canal adjoining or adjacent to or running through any part of the territory of Costa Rica, and to that end leases in perpetuity to the United States the right of entry, occupation, possession, use, and control of such hereinafter-described parts of the territory of Costa Rica as may be used for the construction, maintenance, and operation of said canal, and for occupation, use, and control in connection therewith.

The United States guarantees in perpetuity the sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity of the Republic of Costa Rica.

No change either in the Government or in the laws or treaties of Costa Rica shall, without the consent of the United States, affect any right of the United States under the present convention, or under any treaty stipulation between the two countries, that now exists or that may hereafter exist, touching the subject-matter of this convention.

If Costa Rica shall hereafter enter as a constituent into any other government, or into any union or confederation of States, so as to merge her sovereignty or independence in such government, union, or confederation, the rights of the United States under this convention shall not be in any respect lessened or impaired; and the United States will thereupon be released from all obligations to guarantee the sovereignty, independence, or territorial integrity of the Republic of Costa Rica.

ARTICLE II.

The United States, after the adoption by Congress of legislation to carry this convention into effect, will proceed without delay at its own cost, and without expense to Costa Rica, to construct the canal, on the route which it shall determine to be the most practicable; and it shall have the right to use, without cost, any water, stone, clay, earth, or other material belonging to Costa Rica, on the public domain, that may be needed.

The canal is hereby declared to be a work of public utility.

Neither the Government of Costa Rica, nor any of its authorities, shall obstruct or interfere with the United States either in its preliminary exploration and surveys, or in the work of construction, or in the management, control, repair, and preservation of the canal when completed.

ARTICLE III.

The United States shall have the right to make excavations to such depths and to raise embankments and dam streams to such height as shall in its opinion be necessary for the proper and safe construction, operation, and preservation of the canal, and the control of the waters appurtenant to it, and to those ends shall have the right to use the waters of any lake or stream in the territory of Costa Rica which may be useful to the end in view, and to construct in the territory of Costa Rica any works necessary to accomplish such use of said waters.

If in the construction or operation of the canal or of any works in connection therewith, whether constructed within Costa Rican territory or elsewhere, any lands within Costa Rican territory belonging to the Republic or to private persons should be overflowed, no claim shall be made against the United States on account of those belonging to Costa Rica; nor shall the claim of any private person on account of the overflow of lands be permitted in any manner to hinder or delay the United States in the construction or operation of the canal or of any work in connection therewith; but the United States engages to make compensation in proceedings to condemn such lands for the intended public uses had, as provided in Article V of this convention.

ARTICLE IV.

When the route of the canal shall have been determined, the entire area of land and water to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line thereof shall constitute a district to be called the "canal district," which district shall embrace so much of the territory of Costa Rica as may be adjacent to the River San Juan and to Lake Nicaragua and as may lie within a distance of 5 miles from the said center line of the canal. The concession hereby made to the United States includes the right to construct and operate on the territory of Costa Rica within or adjacent to the canal district, and in particular on Costa Rican territory adjacent to the southeastern part of Lake Nicaragua, such railways, telegraphs, telephones, and other auxiliary works and to erect and use such buildings, workshops, and other structures as may be useful in the construction, improvement, operation, repair, and maintenance of the canal.

If by reason of topographical conditions said railways, telegraphs, telephones, or other auxiliary works should at any place unavoidably lie outside the canal district, there shall be included an area 500 feet wide on each side of said railways, telegraphs, telephones, or other auxiliary works; and the said areas, as well as the railways, telegraphs, telephones, buildings, workshops, and other structures, and the lands on which they are situated, shall be considered as a part of the canal and within the canal district for the purpose of this convention.

ARTICLE V.

When the canal district is established the Government of the United States will furnish the Government of Costa Rica with a map showing the limits thereof as established by this convention, and thereupon the right of entry, occupation, possession, use, and control of the lands and waters comprised in such district shall be considered as granted by a lease in perpetuity to the United States for the purposes of the canal.

Areas of land and waters so comprised that form part of the public domain of Costa Rica shall pass into the use and control of the United States without any cost or charge. If any areas of land or waters so taken, or any right, title, estate, use, or interest therein, are claimed at the date of this convention as the property, legal or equitable, of private persons or corporations, the United States may acquire such rights, titles, estates, use, or interests by purchase from the owners, or, failing in that, may proceed to condemn them. But Costa Rica agrees to make compensation to the United States for all such rights, titles, estates, uses, or interests acquired by the latter of persons or corporations who have obtained the same from Costa Rica since January 1, 1890.

For the purpose of fixing the compensation to be paid by the United States in the condemnation proceedings contemplated in Articles III and V, a mixed commission of four jurists of repute, two to be appointed by each of the contracting parties, shall assess and award the damages to be paid by the United States. The procedure and regulations to be observed by said commission for the taking of evidence and in the trial of cases to condemn and award damages shall be in accordance with the laws of Costa Rica not in conflict with this convention. The damages awarded shall be compensatory only, and fixed without reference to appreciation of values by the contemplated or actual construction of the canal.

In case of the disagreement of the Commission on the amount of damages to be awarded in any case an umpire shall be appointed by the two Governments, who shall render the decision. In the event of the death, absence, or incapacity of any such commissioner or umpire, or of his omitting, declining, or ceasing to act, his place shall be filled by the appointment of another person in the manner above indicated.

All decisions by a majority of the Commission or by the umpire shall be final. They shall keep record of their proceedings, of which they shall furnish each Government a copy. They shall maintain an office at San Jose de Costa Rica and shall exercise their functions there or at such other point in Costa Rica as they may find convenient.

Condemnation proceedings shall be taken in accordance with the regulations prescribed in the appendix of this treaty.

ARTICLE VI.

The sovereignty of Costa Rica, except so far as the excercise thereof is consistent with this convention, shall be in full force in the Costa Rican territory comprised in the canal district; but the United States alone shall have the power to enact, prescribe, and enforce laws and regulations for the government of said district and for the protection of life, liberty, and property and for the preservation of peace and good order therein. It is alone authorized and empowered to establish courts of civil, criminal, and admiralty jurisdiction in said district, which shall have exclusive cognizance of all cases arising under the laws of the United States made applicable thereto. It is alone authorized and empowered to use therein its civil police and, when necessary, its naval and military forces for the protection of the canal and of all persons and vessels engaged in the navigation of the canal and property used in connection therewith, as well as for the preservation of peace, law, and order within said district.

This is the most important part of the convention, and, when it is contrasted with the provisions of the convention proposed by Colombia, we see plainly that it is impossible to accept the proposition of Colombia, while that of Costa Rica and that of Nicaragua are entirely satisfactory.

The United States, for the protection of the canal district and of its rights therein, and in order to make effective its guarantee of the sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, shall have at all times the free and unobstructed right to enter the canal district with its land and naval forces and to adopt therein such measures as may be necessary for the accomplishment of those purposes, and shall also have the right to unite its forces with the forces of Costa Rica and Nicaragua for such purposes.

ARTICLE VII.

A free port or ports may be established auxiliary to the transit at any convenient point of Costa Rican territory within the canal district, under the protection of the United States and subject to harbor and other regulations that shall be adopted by the United States. At such port or ports the United States shall have the right to establish, construct, and maintain dikes, embankments, docks, wharves, repair shops, a coaling station and other appropriate works, and the United States, if it shall undertake the construction and maintenance of any such works, will bear all expense thereof. Vessels of Costa Rica shall have the privilege of the use of such ports and works on the same terms as may be prescribed for vessels of the United States.

Costa Rica may establish custom-houses at such convenient points along Costa Rican border of the canal district as may be selected by agreement of the high contracting parties for the collection of duties on goods imported into the Republic, as well as any export dues on national products exported from the Republic.

The United States shall have the right to introduce into the canal district by way of any Costa Rican port all machinery, equipment, material, stores, and supplies of any kind which may be necessary for the construction, improvement, operation, repair, and maintenance of the canal and for the use of the officials, workmen, and other dependents of the United States employed in the canal district and for their families. Such articles shall be exempt from all taxes and custom duties on the part of Costa Rica.

Vessels of commerce and men of war of all nations shall pass freely into and through the canal without any discrimination as to tolls or other charges, subject to the laws and regulations established by the United States to secure that object. Vessels owned by the United States or its citizens and vessels owned by Costa Rica or its citizens may navigate freely any waters and rivers of Costa Rica adjacent to the canal, and the commanders may enter or moor their vessels therein, it being understood that the laws of Costa Rica regarding coasting trade are not to be infringed, and ordinary port dues are to be paid at points outside the canal district.

ARTICLE VIII.

The United States and Costa Rica agree that, subject to the stipulations of the present convention, the provisions of the Treaty of Constantinople of October 29, 1888, relating to the Suez Canal, as herein stated, shall form the basis on which the navigation of the canal and the neutrality of the canal district shall rest, viz:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal, except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of the article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within three marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than twenty-four hours at any one time except in case of distress, and in such case depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within twenty-four hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purpose of this convention, and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ARTICLE IX.

Costa Rica covenants with the United States and guarantees that no concession, grant, or license for the purposes of trade, commerce, transportation, navigation, or for the construction of a ship canal in or through Costa Rican territory has been made to any other government, corporation, syndicate, or any person, natural or juridical, which in any manner encumbers or conflicts with the lease and the rights and privileges hereby granted.

If any such prior or conflicting rights are claimed, the claimants must look to Costa Rica, and not to the United States, for a settlement.

ARTICLE X.

Although maintaining that upon principles of justice no valid claims of citizens of the United States exist against Costa Rica, the latter accepts the engagement of the United States to pay and to discharge Costa Rica from all liability on account of claims of citizens of the United States which may have arisen prior to the date of the signing of this convention: Provided, however, That the said engagement shall not apply to claims preferred by nationals of any State, or by their government, on account of the annulment, forfeiture, or infringement of any concession, grant, or license mentioned in Article IX, which Costa Rica agrees to pay.

ARTICLE XI.

Within ninety days after the exchange of ratifications of this convention, the United States will pay to the Government of Costa Rica, at Washington, the sum of $1,000,000 in the gold coin of the United States.

Furthermore, the United States will pay to Costa Rica, by way of rental, the sum of $10,000 in gold coin of the United States upon taking possession of the Costa Rican territory leased to the United States by the present convention, and will thereafter pay an equal sum to Costa Rica annually.

ARTICLE XII.

This convention shall take effect immediately upon the exchange of ratification, and, except as amended or abrogated by mutual consent of the contracting parties, shall be perpetual.

The ratification shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at the city of ——, this — day of ——, 190—.

APPENDIX.

Condemnation proceedings may be begun by the United States by filing in the office of the Commission at San José de Costa Rica an instrument declaring its intention to appropriate any or all titles, estates, rights, uses, and interests of every description, legal and equitable, of persons, societies, and corporations in and to Costa Rican land and water areas within the canal district; and it may in like manner institute proceedings to condemn and appropriate such titles, estates, rights, uses, and interests in land and water areas outside of and adjacent to said canal district to enable said Government to construct, repair, and operate said canal.

Said instrument of appropriation shall contain a general description of said land and water areas and of the title, estate, right, use, or interest therein intended to be appropriated which shall belong to the Government of the United States on making payment therefor as hereinafter provided.

Said Government may purchase any such title, estate, right, use, or interest of the owner thereof, or, if the latter is under legal disabilities, of his guardian or other representative or person competent to contract on his behalf, and the deed therefor when made and delivered shall vest the property purchases in the United States.

Or said Government may, at its option, proceed upon filing said act of appropriation by giving ten days' notice by personal service on said owner or by publication for the term of three weeks to all whom it may concern in some newspaper, to be designated by standing order of the Commission, of an advertisement, said notice or advertisement reciting the substance of such instrument of appropriation; and upon completed service of said notice, either personally or by publication, said Government may deposit for the use of the owners, in American gold, with a bank or other fiscal agent, to be designated by standing order of the Commission, of a sum which said Government is willing to pay for the title, estate, rights, uses, or interests appropriated, and the same shall thereupon belong to the United States.

If the owner or owners refuse or fail to accept as sufficient compensation the moneys so deposited for their use, as aforesaid, the Commission or umpire, as the case may be, shall proceed to assess and award the damages, and shall in like manner also determine in all cases the person or persons justly entitled to receive said moneys deposited and awarded and order equitable distribution thereof. Said proceedings before the Commission or umpire shall only affect the amount of compensation to be awarded and the distribution thereof. Any sum awarded in addition to that already deposited shall be deposited in like manner as the original for the use of the persons entitled thereto.

Mr. MORGAN. The great question of jurisdiction in the canal zone or canal belt is whether or not the Government of the United States shall have exclusive right or jurisdiction to determine all matters through its judicial tribunals, civil and criminal, that arise in that belt. That includes the jurisprudence which affects commercial and maritime affairs. Here in this draft of the convention made by Mr. Hay and concurred in by Costa Rica——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me just a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the date of that proposed convention?

Mr. MORGAN. There is no date to it.

Mr. SPOONER. There is no date to it?

Mr. MORGAN. No; it is a copy of a paper which Mr. Hay sent to the Government of Costa Rica, and which is now being translated. It will be signed by the Government of Costa Rica and dated when Mr. Hay signs it, if Congress will permit him to do so by the passage of the bill now before the Senate.

The point I wish to get before the Senate is that Costa Rica and Nicaragua in the cession of the canal belt have given to the United States exclusive jurisdiction in all matters relating to judicial affairs in that belt and also the power to use their forces, whether they belong to the Army or the armed police or the unarmed police, for the purpose of preserving law and order in the canal zone.

I mention these facts, Mr. President, for the purpose of contrasting this with the proposition of Colombia, which is very different, indeed, and which is dangerously different to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. I like this very much better.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator says he likes it very much better. Of course, I think if the Senator looks at it carefully he will be as well satisfied with it as Mr. Hay appears to be, who sent it down for the purpose of having it agreed to. I know personally that Mr. Hay has spent a long time in the consideration of this question. It is a new question. This is the first instance in history I am aware of where one government is to exercise its powers within the limits of another government without invading its sovereignty, so as perfectly and fully to complete the purposes we wish to accomplish in that territory in constructing a great public work which is to be owned and operated for all time. This is the first instance, and being res nova, as a matter of course it took careful study to develop into language, to formulate into words and phrases the precise meaning necessary to convey these rights. So our able and very faithful Secretary of State has spent a long time formulating these agreements, and these Governments have substantially accepted them, and as to that part of this case it is absolutely free from all possible doubt or difficulty.

Now, Mr. President, I am very well aware that in my effort to close this debate I will have a great deal more to do than anyone could accomplish if I were to follow the tenth part of the suggestions and arguments that have been made in opposition to the views which the committee entertain. I wish, however, to put in a plea for the committee, Mr. President. It is a body of men whom I feel great honor in being associated with. Nearly all of them are old and experienced Senators, and most of them have been on this committee a long time and have made themselves as familiar with this subject as hard study and laborious application could possibly make them.

So the Senate can receive, I think, with some degree of confidence their suggestions, even where they differ with the Canal Commission upon a question simply of finance, and that is all the difference there is between us. We of course have our preference for the Nicaragua route over the Panama route, but that involves questions of climate, country, population, production, and all that, as against fevers, troubles and dangers to men, dangers to human life, as well as what, according to their own admissions, we find to be involved in a cloud of doubt that they have really not been able to clear up and have created by their own disagreements. The oracular statements as to their unanimity are to be taken with much allowance. As to being harmonious, these reiterated assertions are not true. It has required many such orations even to make them pass without criticism by the Senate.

Now, we come here with our report and we have the right to say, because of the facts upon which we have rested our views of this matter, that we are entitled to as much respect as the Isthmian Canal Commission upon a question as to the cost of the canal. I do not mean the engineers' estimate, but the cost of maintenance, for instance, and the cost of it also in respect of the accounts which these gentlemen have rendered. We take their figures and their accounts just as they made them and we venture to strike out certain items. When we reduce the cost of maintenance to reasonable terms and certain expletive items are stricken out that have no basis in justice or law or fact, we find that the account, instead of being against Nicaragua on the financial statement, is in favor of it.

I can not now state or review the facts I have so carefully stated in my speeches on this bill. I have not the time to do so. But I have proven what I again assert, and no Senator has ventured to question the facts or the conclusions. Whenever the facts and figures stated by the Commission destroy their conclusions, and the logic of the situation is appealed to, the cry goes up from the friends of the Panama Canal and from the apologists of the Panama Canal Company and of the Colombian concordat, "Protect the sacred oracle!" How dare a committee of the Senate to question its utterances? Yet, we feel bound to do so.

I will take up the subject of maintenance, for an example, merely. I do not know any reason why it should cost three times as much to maintain the Nicaragua route or the Panama route as it costs to maintain the Suez Canal, or the Kiel Canal, or the Manchester Canal. If these gentlemen had given us some data, if in their report or in any appendix to it, they had stated the items of cost so that we could form some judgment upon the correctness of their valuation, etc.—which was our right, and we are certainly not cut off from that—then the matter would have been so much easier and so much simpler in a fair discussion. But they furnished none. Every engineer who was brought before the committee who was asked the question as to what was a proper estimate for the maintenance and support of the canal said he could not tell except by comparison with other canals.

That was the only chance we had, because these commissioners have furnished no data. They have not stated a solitary fact upon which they predicate their findings. What had we to do then? We groped along in the dark about it, until I finally thought to ask Colonel Ernst how this was. He said that the Commission had had this subject up and it was discussed between them, but the commissioners could not come to a conclusion and it resulted at last that they concluded to state what they believed to be a proper estimate, put it down and report it, and that they would not make any report of the facts.

Well, when we come to look at that, what do we find? We find a plan of government provided for the canal that is large enough for a State in this Union, with enormous salaries. Five or seven, I forget which it is now, of these men are to reside here in Washington and constitute a supreme commission. They are not to risk their precious lives in the fevers and swamps of that isthmus, but are to be here. They are to direct all the operations of the canal, approve all accounts, make all appointments of engineers and all employees. That is to be the function of that great head commission.

I said to the Senate on more than one occasion, I think, that we might just as well appoint a commission in Washington, to reside here and govern the Philippine Islands, as to appoint a commission to reside here to govern that canal.

These wild romances of expenditures, for the sake of grandeur, are called "engineers' estimates," and are classed among the sacred utterances of experts that it is blasphemous to question.

If engineers are armed with these expert powers against the Treasury, it is time that we had taken some measures for the public defense and the general welfare.

The salaries, of course, were to be enormous—$15,000 a year to each of them, besides clerks, quarters, stationery, and everything they could possibly desire.

Now, after organizing that head or central government here in Washington, they organize a subordinate government down there, and it consists of a president of the canal at a salary of $15,000 a year, and boards of engineers, lawyers, navigators, medical men, and all that, each with large pay. They supply them with steamboats, launches, and the like for carrying on their business, and then they make these allowances renewable annually. They build a steamboat this year and throw it away the next; then build another. These are the annual contributions, the fixed charges, upon this canal, in these estimates of the cost of maintenance.

Mr. President, I do not wonder that those Commissioners did not want the world to scrutinize those figures. They could not agree amongst themselves about it, and they concluded they would not furnish them. Colonel Ernst saved a copy. I asked him to produce it, and he did so; and here it is in the RECORD. I am not speaking otherwise, Mr. President, than by the card about this business.

Now, have not the committee the right to investigate that subject and to say you have embarrassed both of these routes, or whichever one is chosen, with an enormous and an unnecessary expenditure?

There is no difficulty in running up an account for maintenance and operating expenses when no figures or facts are given, so as to overwhelm the longer canal with this fanciful disadvantage! But it is very far from being just.

When they come to apportion these expenditures between the two canals the rating is entirely arbitrary. So far as we could ascertain, it seemed to be done by miles, the Panama Canal being so many miles long, and the Nicaragua Canal so many more miles long, the increase of expenditure would be in proportion to the mileage. A large part of that consists of maintenance of locks, when it is more than a hundred miles between two of the locks on the Nicaraguan Canal, and there is slack water and lake-level navigation of over a hundred miles.

I will now drop that subject, but it has been referred to here so often that I had to refer to it. When we come to apply to this canal the charges that apply to the Suez Canal, which is the nearest approximation we can get, we find it reported here from the Treasury Department that those charges are not more than a million and a half dollars a year; and yet the charges upon the Nicaraguan Canal are largely over $3,000,000.

We had the right to differ with the Commission on that ground. We did not feel overawed because Mr. McKinley had appointed distinguished gentlemen upon this Commission, and we did not feel like the Hon. Mr. Cromwell seemed to have felt about this business. I can not neglect Mr. Cromwell, because he will not permit it. He is obliged to figure wherever there is a chance to appear at all.

I read here in the Senate the other day a letter that he sent in as counsel for the Panama Canal Company addressed to the President of the United States, and said to him that he ought not to appoint upon the Isthmian Canal Commission any of the men who had been on the previous Walker or Nicaragua Commission. He boldly stated this to the President of the United States, his letter being signed "counsel for the Panama Canal Company." He objected to Haupt, to Walker, and to Hains, because they had been on the previous commission and had reported against the Panama Canal. Now, he becomes a joint negotiator, as counsel for the Panama Canal Company, with the Government of Colombia, and he sends his letter in with the proposed treaty, and makes a tremendous display of what Colombia believes and thinks.

Now, listen to this: After he had got into that company, see what a tremendous expansion occurred. I wonder that he had not gone off like Mont Pelee:

SULLIVAN & CROMWELL, New York, March 31, 1902.

SIR: In connection with the presentation by Señor Jose Vicenté Concha, minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary from the Republic of Colombia, of a proposed concessionary convention or treaty between the United States and Colombia, to further the completion, operation, control, and protection of the Panama Canal by the United States, I have been requested by the minister, in view of my relation to the subject as general counsel of the Panama Canal Company, and of my knowledge of the minister's views derived from our daily conferences in the preparation of the treaty, to submit the following reflections:

Colombia welcomes the United States to its territory, and will facilitate in every way reasonable within its power the consummation of the desires and needs of the United States for the completion, operation, maintenance, control, and protection of the interoceanic canal across its domain, subject, of course, to the sovereignty of Colombia, and a reasonable and just convention between the two nations.

Colombia views with admiration, as does the rest of the world, the splendid magnanimity, the far-seeing statesmanship, the virile and comprehensive policy which moves this people to construct the greatest undertaking which ever has engaged the attention of mankind, not for its own benefit alone, nor with selfish preference to its own commerce, but for the common benefit, upon equal terms and under universal neutrality in times of peace for all the peoples of the earth.

History does not furnish another instance of such national generosity, patriotism, and wisdom.

This could not but call out from Colombia the warmest response; and that nation takes pride in associating herself with an affair conducted upon such an elevated plane of national and international duty and concern.

The Isthmian Canal Commission, a most distinguished and able body, selected with such care by President McKinley to consider all possible isthmian canal routes and to determine which of them it is most to the interest of the United States to acquire, has reported unanimously that the Panama route is the most practicable and feasible route for an isthmian canal to be under the control, management, and ownership of the United States. Therefore the solution of the problem only involves two other conditions:

1. The sale by the New Panama Canal Company to the United States of the concession, property, and rights of the canal, with the shares of the Panama Railroad Company; and

2. A new concessionary convention or treaty with Colombia.

3. The first of these two conditions already has been made easy of fulfillment in the formal acceptance by the New Panama Canal Company of the valuation fixed by the Isthmian Canal Commission—$40,000,000—and by its duly authorized proposal to the United States for a sale of the property at that price (subject, of course, to a satisfactory convention being arrived at between the United States and Colombia).

The sole remaining condition, then, is the determination of the concessionary and treaty relations of the United States to a zone of territory across the Isthmus of Panama necessary for the consummation of the undertaking.

* * * * * * *

While the minister of Colombia was in Washington for more than a year waiting for the moment when the subject could be seriously and attentively discussed, it is only since January 4, 1902, that anything could be definitely said or done, since then, and then only, was a definite proposal of sale made by the canal company. Immediately thereupon, however, the Government of Colombia, requiring the service of its then minister in other important fields, designated its minister of war, Señor Concha, as minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary, to come at once from Bogota to Washington, charged with its ripest views and amplest instructions, to confer with the Executive authorities of the United States, and, after exchange of information and opinions, to reach a satisfactory convention. This is a misrepresentation. Concha was withdrawn because, as I have proved by his public statement, he had refused to represent to the United States that the last concession of Colombia to the Panama Canal Company was valid. He refused to misrepresent the facts and thereupon he became useless to Colombia and disagreeable to Cromwell.

Minister Concha has devoted himself, since his arrival a few weeks ago, absorbingly to this task and is prepared to reach a conclusion with the Executive officers of the Government.

He is fully empowered to negotiate and sign a treaty, subject only to the ratification of the Colombian Congress, as in like cases with all nations.

The establishment of a canal convention involves, as you are so well aware, besides the utilization of a canal zone for the construction, operation, maintenance, control, and protection of a canal, railroad, and auxiliary works, as well as a grant renewable perpetually and a consent to the sale by the New Panama Canal Company (all of which Colombia concedes in the convention submitted), but also numerous other grave questions relating to judicial procedure, punishment of crimes, the capture of criminals, sanitary and police regulations of Panama and Colon, proper regard to the vested interests upon the Isthmus, exemption of the United States from all forms of taxes, port charges, or other dues, etc. Quite aside from pecuniary matters, these are subjects which only can be examined and negotiated directly with you in person, and are impossible of negotiation with the Houses of Congress.

Permit me to call attention to the facts that a canal convention in respect of the Isthmus of Panama necessarily involves considerations which do not relate to a section where there is but a wilderness, uninhabited by man and producing no income to the nation. The convention respecting the Panama route covers a zone which has been the pathway of commerce across the continent for four hundred years, with important cities at its termini, with villages along the route, with a settled population, with considerable property, and with important vested interests to be taken into consideration.

All this represents an increment of value in civilizing influences, in means of protection, in expenditures of national funds for improvement and development, as well as in certitude of engineering plans, of all which the United States now may derive the benefit.

It would be neither in order nor fitting for the canal company or myself to express any views, one way or the other, upon any of the provisions of the proposed treaty, and our reserve in that regard will be noted. However, I beg to refer, by special request of the minister, to Article XXV of his proposed treaty, and which article relates to the pecuniary terms. Colombia is prepared to discuss, negotiate, and decide upon the precise sum or sums which may be reasonable for the United States to pay and for Colombia to ask, but as the subject is in the hands of Congress, and it seems impracticable at the moment to secure a definite expression of the views of the United States upon the subject, Colombia manifests its good faith and reasonableness by proposing that the annuity shall be only such sum as mutually may be agreed upon between the nations, or, failing in such agreement, such fair and reasonable amount as may be determined by a high commission presided over by the president of the international peace tribunal of The Hague, the remaining members being nominated in equal number by the two nations. Such annuity would only be fixed once in a hundred years.

* * * * * * *

Colombia does not ask more than what may be determined to be fair and reasonable, and surely the United States does not wish to do less than that.

I have the honor to be, Mr. Secretary, your obedient servant,

WM. NELSON CROMWELL,
General Counsel New Panama Canal Company.

Hon. JOHN HAY,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

This is the man who put in the protest against Walker and Haupt and Hains because they had been on a previous commission and reported against him, now coming in with this fulsome eulogiums upon them—nearly as enthusiastic as some I have heard pronounced in the Senate; so nearly alike that they sound to me like quotations. This is the standard eulogium crystallized in the beautiful language of the Hon. Mr. Cromwell, general counsel of the Panama Canal Company.

I trace this man back—other Senators, I know, have not had time to observe it—back to the beginning of this whole business. He has not failed to appear anywhere in this whole affair; and after this convention was submitted here, he finds his way to the rear end of the report of the minority of the committee, and they quote his letter. Of course he wrote it; and, Mr. President, there is so much in the balance of that minority report of the committee that is just like it that I have dreadful fears that Mr. Cromwell wrote pretty nigh the whole report. I am sure that Mr. Cromwell never appeared before the committee—he would have been received with delight there—for the purpose of undergoing the test of a cross-examination; and before he got through it I think he would have shrunk a little in his magnitude, to say the least of it.

I have discharged my obligation to show the conduct of this marplot to the Senate, distasteful as has been this public duty, and shall take no further notice of him. Whoever has the unhappy task of conducting diplomatic negotiations with the New Panama Canal Company on behalf of the United States will have to encounter the audacity of the diplomat who, in the name of that company, is the joint negotiator for Colombia with Señor Concha, and it is my duty to give warning. That will be the first event of its kind in all history, and the weight of the distinction is likely to overburden any other than a very hardened man. I warn that distinguished citizen, whoever he may be, to beware of Mr. Cromwell.

Mr. President, an issue has been made up, after long and discursive debate, which relates to the real question whether Congress shall now make actual provision for the construction of a canal or whether it shall enter upon a new field of exploration and experiment to find a location on which a canal can be safely constructed, and the rights for that purpose, which can be now obtained. If the rights can not now be obtained at Panama the question is simply one of delay until they can be obtained. It will turn out that these rights can never be obtained, and the delay will answer all the purposes of the opponents of any canal unless the President will close the hunt in some reasonable time.

Colombia has no parliamentary government and is engaged in civil war. She can make no treaty because she has no congress to ratify it.

The acquisition of a clear title to a canal zone, or belt, to connect the oceans is, of course, the first question to be settled. Colombia can make no such grant until a law is enacted by her Congress to authorize it, and if it is accepted by the United States in a convention or a treaty such treaty must be ratified by the Congress of Colombia. These are constitutional requirements that must be complied with, and they can not be complied with until Colombia can assemble a congress, which she is afraid to attempt. If the people of the United States are to wait for authority to construct a canal in Colombia until these things are accomplished, the transcontinental railroads will get all the delay for which they have been paying so liberally.

On the question of title the Isthmian Canal Commission report that the title of Nicaragua and Costa Rica is unembarrassed by any consideration or any claim of any kind, and they come here and proffer conventions for our acceptance. Here is presented the question of direct action, without delay, against postponement that is indefinite as to time, and is not certain as to our power to get a good title from Colombia or the Panama Canal Company. It is certain, on the face of the transaction, that we will not be able to acquire a title to the Panama Canal from Colombia unless we take hold of affairs in that Republic with a strong hand and end the civil war there.

Costa Rica and Nicaragua have cleared up every difficulty in the way of title, but, on the other hand, the difficulties in regard to the Panama route are obvious, dangerous, involved, and tremendous. If they are solved at all in a satisfactory way, I am afraid it will be at the end of years and years.

So the question narrows itself down to the proposition whether we should accept the Nicaragua Canal and build it now under the Hepburn bill or whether we should launch out into an exploration on two or three or more points. The first one is an exploration to find title to the property and to get somebody to convey it and a government to guarantee it—not a disreputable corporation whose stockholders were forced to pay money, in this way, to escape punishment for crime.

The next point, of course, would be whether it is an available canal route in an engineering sense after you obtain it. The next point is, whether humanity could stand the use of the Panama Canal after it had been built. If a splendid and giant frame, like that of my colleague [Mr. PETTUS] when he was a young man, was subjected by a single day's passage through that route to sickness that came near taking him out of the world, and his friends were in despair about him for months and months, after having spent even a single day or a single night on the Isthmus of Panama, it is an extremely hazardous venture for Congress to vote, in the language of General Grant, that "Labor and Death shall join hands there."

The saving of $5,000,000 in the cost of the canal or the magnanimous bestowal of $40,000,000 on the characters that own the New Panama Canal will scarcely compensate Congress for voting such dangers and sufferings on the people who are to build the canal or the millions who are to use it.

So that it is clear and undeniable that the choice of the Nicaragua route means direct and immediate action by Congress to open a canal, while the choice of the Panama route means postponement of the building of a canal at least until three future events have occurred, each of which is embarrassed by serious doubts and difficulties that have not been overcome.

These embarrassments are so serious that the committee believe that they can never be overcome. The Senator from Wisconsin believes that some of them can not be overcome so as to meet the demand made in the substitute, as he proposed it and offered it in the Senate and had it referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and he now brings in amendments to his substitute so as to conform our action, not to accomplish what he so boldly and so properly demanded for the United States, but to conform our action to what Colombia is willing to do, and to what the Panama Canal Company may be able to do.

As to the width of the canal belt, his amendment of his amendment drops the figures from 10 to 6 miles. Why did he do that? Why, after putting in an amendment here, which demanded from the Government of the United States a 10-mile canal belt there, should he drop to six? It was because the Colombian Government in its proposition dropped from 10 miles to 6 on the same principle exactly that the slump took place in the price of the property. The principle is to win at any sacrifice.

In the third section of the substitute the Senator from Wisconsin strikes out the all-important word "obtained" from the provision in the following language: "That when the President shall have obtained a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company," and he substitutes the words "arranged to secure" a satisfactory title to that property. Why did he put that in? Because he knew that we would have to hunt up the Colombian Government, in the woods fighting.

He knows that a revolution is in progress in Colombia and no matter which side is successful the other side will do all that can be done to defeat any conveyance to us. So the Senator is obliged to be content with an arrangement "to secure" a title instead of an actual conveyance and guaranty of title. This is a sad makeshift.

He knows that there is a division there between the Church party and the Liberals, and that they are killing each other by the hundreds for they are fighting terrific battles; they are fighting like men who know how to fight—with desperate determination. He knows that the Congress of Colombia has not assembled for three years; he knows that the constitution of Colombia requires two propositions to be complied with: First, the authority of any agent of the Government, including the President, to make a contract with a foreign government of any kind; second, the ratification of a treaty, whenever it was made, not by the President and the Senate, or the President alone, but by an act of their Congress. So their Congress is an indispensable factor and prerequisite to any arrangement that can be made there that has the slightest symptom of legality in it. So the Senator has, on second thought, taken lower ground in his amended substitute, and has struck out the words "that title should be obtained" and inserted instead that it should be "arranged to secure" a satisfactory title to that property.

In the case of Colombia—and it applies to both Colombia and the Panama Canal Company—the Senator inserts the words "shall have obtained by treaty" control of the necessary territory from the Republic of Colombia.

This change must mean that there is no Congress in Colombia to enact the requisite laws, and that we will adopt the method of the Panama Canal Company in getting the last extension of its concession by going over the head of the Colombian Congress and paying the President a bonus for treating with us. Why do we say that? It is because this proposed convention says that, in addition to the $40,000,000 we have to pay to the Panama Canal Company, we also have to pay in gold $1,000,000—5,000,000 francs—which is the value at par of the stock that was given to Colombia by the Panama Canal Company for signing the last concession, which they have obtained, and which is void, Mr. President.

They demand $1,000,000 in the convention Mr. Concha and Mr. Cromwell have presented to Mr. Hay, and this change in the substitute will cover that demand, whether it is so intended or not.

Whatever motives may influence the choice between these routes the Senators who vote for the Nicaraguan route will prove their readiness to respond to the will of the people, which has found such clear and emphatic expression in the votes of the House of Representatives in the Fifty-sixth and Fifth-seventh Congresses on the passage of the first bill, known as the Hepburn bill, and the second one that is entitled to that honorable designation.

Those who vote for the Spooner substitute are not ready to vote for any canal, until it is first ascertained and decided by the President that a suitable concession can be had from Colombia and a good title to the canal can be purchased from the Panama Canal Company free of all incumbrance and a good title from New York can be obtained for the Panama Railroad.

These wild hunts for titles to property for which we are to pay $48,000,000 in cash would be very exciting and would be prosecuted with

Horse and hound
And bugle sound

if delay was not quite as satisfying to the great railroads as the capture of the covey.

We have to go to New York to get that. New York is never mentioned here. They have got to make an enactment that the United States Government shall own that railroad, and shall have a perfect right to pull it up, if they want to, and disappoint all the public expectations upon which the charter was granted. We must go there before we get through with this job; we have to go around dealing with Colombia, Panama, and New York, then make a treaty with the Colombian Congress, and then have that treaty submitted here to the Senate to be confirmed by a two-thirds majority before we can start to build a canal. An indefinite space lies before the expectations of these gentlemen, and the gratification of some of them that it will defeat the canal entirely; and the machinery laid down in the Spooner amendment to this bill will defeat any canal whatever on this continent for the next fifteen years, unless the President is determined to do justice to the country rather than to the advocates of a particular canal route.

No one has anything to do but to arise amongst the minority of the Senate—a minority of one-third—and make his point against any such treaty, and away goes the whole scheme. That may be well or it may be ill, but on this great and important subject it will bring up a question, Mr. President, about which this country had better make due inquiry before it acts, and it is this: The House of Representatives is required by this bill to appropriate many millions of dollars. The House therefore has the control—I mean of its part of the machinery—for putting this whole plan into operation. Why do we, after getting the appropriation from the House, a continuing appropriation even up to $180,000,000, with $40,000,000 to purchase out the Panama Canal Company, and another million for purchasing the president down there, for buying the stock in the canal company that is owned by Colombia—5,000,000 francs. We are to have a title to the Panama Railroad or we lose the only valuable asset of the whole array, the alleged schedule of which is still in French and has never been translated. After the House has done all this, why should we say to them that there shall be no canal until a treaty is brought back here duly negotiated and two-thirds of the Senate agree to ratify it?

Mr. President, we do not want to raise a point of that kind with the House of Representatives. It is not necessary to do it. We did not do it in the case of the annexation of Texas or in the case of the annexation of Hawaii. The Congress of the United States has demonstrated that it has ability by an act of legislation to acquire territory from foreign countries, whether it is absolute sovereignty or whether it is in the nature of a privilege. Why should we put into this bill that all this hunting around for title and incumbrances and clearing them off is to take place, and after we get through that the matter shall be brought back to the Senate of the United States and confirmed by a two-thirds vote of the Senate?

There are enough men on this floor, and there will be enough men for the next fifty years, in favor of the transcontinental railroads, who will be opposed to the construction of the canal to defeat any treaty that can be brought here for building an isthmian waterway for the accommodation of the people. If I wanted to defeat a canal, I do not know of any piece of machinery that I would resort to with more confidence than I would to a treaty. I have no doubt that would suit the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], because he is honestly opposed to a canal.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think the Senator has any right to say that I am opposed to a canal. I am not opposed to a canal. I have asserted here many times that we ought to have a sea-level canal, and I do not approve of any other, if we can get it properly, and at less cost than we will get either of these canals.

Mr. MORGAN. To do that we have got to oppose every commission that ever sat on the case; we have got to oppose the opinions of all the engineers, particularly of the Isthmian Canal Commission, who say if it is possible—not that it is—but that if it is possible, a sea-level canal should be built. I suppose I shall be unable to satisfy the Senator from Colorado or any other of the opponents of the Nicaragua Canal on that point.

The commission appointed by General Grant, of which General Humphreys was the head, was for six years engaged in these explorations up and down that coast at every possible place. They made their report, and their report made it necessary to eliminate from consideration all other questions except those that related to Panama and Nicaragua, and they considered the matter very carefully. They had sent Lull, and he had a splendid body of engineers, headed by Menocal as chief engineer, across that Isthmus of Panama, and made the first instrumental survey that ever was made. Their report is in the committee room and can be examined. Lull made a measurement of every inch of it, and since then other surveys have been made.

Mr. HARRIS. And the French international committee of engineers also reported against the Panama route.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; the French international committee of engineers reported against it after De Lesseps had gone there and expended all this money and had died broken hearted and a convict—poor, old man. They did not let him know it, but they convicted him in the courts and withheld judgment until he could die, and then they convicted his son, and I am afraid they did that wrongfully. The poor fellow had to escape from France, and is an outcast and wanderer over the earth to-day because of these Panama frauds. The very men who perpetrated those frauds—the worst of them—were taken up in the courts, some of them convicted of malfeasance and of other crimes, and they were heavily fined. The promotors of the Panama scheme went to them and said, "Unless you furnish the money to carry on this new Panama Canal project we will enforce the law against you; but if you will furnish it, we will wipe out the past and let you go scot-free," and they did it.

Mr. President, I got my first real, actual information on that subject from the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission. I suppose Senators must have read it very often, but as the Senate ought never to forget it, I will read it again:

The liquidator found himself laboring under special legal difficulties, from which he obtained relief by the special law of the French Chambers, dated July 1, 1893. (See Appendix KK.)

This act has been quoted time and again.

He finally secured the organization of a new company on the 20th of October, 1894, with a capital stock of 650,000 shares of 100 francs each. Six hundred thousand shares had been subscribed to be paid for in cash, and 50,000 shares were given as full-paid stock to the Colombian Government in compliance with the terms of the extension of the concession, dated December 26, 1890. Thus the cash capital of the company was 60,000,000 francs, or $11,640,000, a sum deemed sufficient for the provisional operations contemplated. The scandals connected with the failure of the old company, which had led to the prosecution and conviction of De Lesseps and other prominent persons, had made it difficult to secure even that amount.

Suits had been brought against certain loan associations, administrators, contractors, and others who were supposed to have unduly profited by the extravagant management of the old company. A series of compromises were made with these persons, by which it was agreed that they should subscribe for stock in the new company on condition that the suits should be dropped. Whatever amount remained to make up the 60,000,000 francs, after deducting the sums thus obtained and those to be obtained by public subscription, was to be subscribed by the liquidator.

Here are the names of those men, and Eiffel was one of them. I need not read them.

Now, I must be excused, Mr. President, when that same set of men come here to make a contract with us; when they throw away $69,000,000 at a single jump—from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000—I must be excused for saying that I have too much respect for my Government to advise it to take that thing by the hand and to make a contract with it; but after they have prearranged the disposal of the $40,000,000, so that they will get back their money with at least 50 per cent profit on it, the balance of the stockholders will go without a shilling.

In the name of all that is respectable and good in the world, are we to be invited to enter into negotiations with a crowd like that in order to ascertain whether we can get, free of incumbrance, title to that property? Ought not Colombia, if she wants to sell this property to us, go to her concessionaire, the Panama Canal Company, clean up this dirty muddle, and become the guarantor to us of a perfect title to the property, free of all incumbrance? That is what Costa Rica and Nicaragua do. Why can not Colombia do the same? Why have we got provisions in the amendment that is proposed here to disregard her constitution and for going to the President, when the evidence in this case shows beyond all question that he received a bribe of a million dollars for signing that other contract, the last concession, then went into the field and used it in cutting the throats of the Liberals because they opposed this terrible document that my colleague [Mr. PETTUS] read here to the Senate on yesterday? I mean "the concordat" of Pope Leo XIII, which recalls the worst features of the Spanish Inquisition and makes the holy bonds of matrimony, when celebrated by civil authority, of no more value than the vow of a harlot to her partner in crime.

Mr. President, we are getting onto ground that is very dangerous indeed. It is not the loss of men and money, perhaps. We may have men to throw away and as much money to spend as anybody else, but the danger is to the glorious reputation of this splendid free Republic. Her representatives here ought not participate in a trade like this with the Panama Canal Company. Her own commission comes here and denounces it, and shows men convicted of penitentiary crimes with whom to-day we are advised to go and make an arrangement about the $40,000,000.

I do not wish to indulge in diatribe against it. I state the facts, and I get the facts out of the Isthmian Canal Commission's report, but I sustain them—I do not mean that I do, but the committee do—by calling the secretary of the company from New York, who was the secretary for years, and he testifies to the same facts; by calling Mr. Pasco, and he testifies to the same facts; by calling up the report signed by Hon. John R. Fellows in the House of Representatives, who brings forward not exactly the same facts, but the facts that led up to them, and prove what I now declare beyond contradiction.

After all this am I to be accused of defaming the Panama Canal Company, when I am merely trying to protect the Government of the United States against the shame of contract intercourse or association with them, basing what I have to say solely upon the sworn testimony of enlightened witnesses and the report that I have just read from the Isthmian Canal Commission? Gentlemen who want to touch that thing can do it.

So when my honorable friend, the Senator from Iowa, who did me the honor to say that he had with pleasure assisted me for so many years to pass a bill for the Nicaragua Canal, has left me to go off and deal with a company of that kind, I must say to him I can not go with him. It is he who is leaving. It is not I. I stand on the ground where General Grant stood, and more than any other man who ever lived he influenced my conduct in this matter.

I am very glad to say, now that he is dead and gone, that I am not at all grieved for any influence that the opinion of General Grant exercises over my judgment about anything, for he was an honest and brave man, and he was a perfectly true gentleman and a true American. Grant sent out Ammen and Humphreys, and they spent years and came back and reported to him. They are men of absolute integrity. I love to say it of old Daniel Ammen, now in his grave, that a truer man never slept beneath American soil, nor one more honest in his devotion to his country. General Grant, after having spoken about Nicaragua, said:

In view of these advantages the question naturally arises with regard to the most feasible route for the canal, both as regards economy of construction and convenience in use. On this point it would hardly seem as if there were room for controversy. The difficulties which surround the Panama scheme have been so frequently and so forcibly set forth that they need not be elaborately repeated here. The floods of this region, caused by sudden and immense rainfall, have attracted the attention of the most careless traveler and have perplexed and confounded the scientific engineer in his attempts to provide some method by which to overcome the difficulties which they create. The impassable and unhealthy swamps lying along this route have always been considered unfit for a water course and so destructive to human life that labor and death seemed to have joined hands there.

The American people will recollect that it is a country where labor and death join hands, and when this Government inflicts upon you, who must do the actual work, the necessity of labor taking death by the hand, the chances being 80 to 1 against you, remember it, and remember, if you please, that I stand here to-day an old man protesting against it.

The necessity for long and expensive tunnels or open cuts and for a safe viaduct has added vastly to the expense of the route when estimated, and to the obstacles to be overcome by engineering. The most careful surveys have always developed a discouraging want of material for construction.

The addition of 500 miles to the distance between New York and the ports on the west coast of the United States by the Panama route over that of any other feasible route proposed, and the long and tedious calms which prevail in Panama Bay have never failed to create opposition to this route in the mind of the navigator. The enormous cost of the Panama Canal, moreover, has never been denied. Considering the engineering difficulties attending the diversion of the Chagres River, and the necessary construction of an artificial lake to hold its floods, together with the tunneling, or open cuts, to which allusion has already been made, the cost of this canal can not be less than $400,000,000, and would probably be much more—including the payment to the Panama Railroad for its concession. No American capitalist would be likely to look for dividends on an investment like this.

Two hundred and sixty million dollars has been spent on the Panama Canal already, and they claim that it is two-fifths done. Grant was not wrong. If that man was here to-day to hear this testimony, would he feel rebuked when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] rose and told him he had no right to an opinion in the face of the fact that the Isthmian Canal Commission had come to a different conclusion. Grant was an honest man, a brave one, and it requires honest men and brave ones to overcome some certain conditions that occur in this country. I would rather take an honest and a brave fool than the smartest rascal who ever lived.

I will leave gentlemen to digest what I have said and to see whether or not the Senator from Ohio is right when he says this is a fresh question, just now sprung, when Grant at the date of that letter, which was in February, 1891, went through the whole subject with as clear a light as any man in the Senate has to-day, if he will take a week to pen his thoughts and to digest the evidence.

The people will not be indifferent to our action, and no personal or political influence will prevent them from ascertaining the cause of our refusal to give them the waterway that can alone unfetter them from the monopoly of transportation and the exorbitant freight rates that barely allow them to exist upon the products of their toil.

They will also inquire into the reasons that have again plunged the country into the vexation and delays that have hung about this canal movement for fifty years and have raised a new set of questions, some of which have so disgusted the French people that they refuse to raise $100,000,000 to complete the Panama Canal, and thereby rescue the $260,000,000 they have sunk in trying to construct it. Our people will not forget the lesson that the French people have been taught, but I hope they will be forbearing toward those who profess to be in favor of a canal and yet will never do anything to bring about its construction.

If this delay, uncertainty, and disappointment visited upon the people could be traced to any reasonable doubt that the Nicaragua Canal is feasible and practicable, the people would not censure us for being cautious and deliberate, but, when the Spooner substitute also provides for a canal on that route, they are obliged to know that the supporters of that amendment are so satisfied with that route that they are willing to spend $180,000,000 of the people's money to build it, and that fact closes the argument as to the real value of that canal. It is affirmed by the Spooner amendment as it is, also, by two reports and one sworn statement of the Isthmian Canal Commision.

When we are asked to vote for a measure the second section of which provides for the building of the Nicaragua Canal in the event that we can not acquire the Panama route, there is a full settlement of the question whether or not the Nicaragua route is worthy of having that amount of money spent upon it. I do not care to argue a question like that, which is disposed of by the very form of the amendment.

The Spooner substitute requires the Senate and the people to turn away from their firm ground and to take a journey into an unknown country, among unknown people, with bad laws, worse habits, and the worst health record in all the world, to find a canal route that is alleged to be better than the Nicaragua route, and if we find that we can not get a good title to an old canal ditch that is there, and proper concessions from a government that can not convene a congress, and for a reasonable sum, then we are to return to the Nicaragua route and make a final location. I think we had better settle there first without going to all this expense and unnecessary delay.

I am afraid to risk the good nature of the Republics of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, small as they are, so far as to count certainly upon their consent that we may go through their land, in our journey through the wilderness. They may claim that their present offers of concessions are based upon our acceptance of Mr. McKinley's agreement with them on December 1, 1900, which the Spooner amendment disregards. I am always wary of small people, of either sex, when they feel that they are not justly dealt with. They are apt to think it is on account of their size and to become very resentful.

On the search for a better canal route we already know that the difficulties are many and serious. We must set out with a pilot who is a lawyer learned in his profession.

If we should follow the example of the minority of the committee we would have the advantage, it is true, of Mr. Cromwell, who has decorated their report with a luminous opinion as to French and American law, and has also written the official preface to the draft of the treaty with Colombia, addressed to Mr. Hay, Secretary of State, March 31, 1902, and signed "Wm. Nelson Cromwell, general counsel New Panama Canal Company."

If we should not engage him as counsel, we will not lose the benefit of his advice or valuable assistance, for his generosity is excessive in bestowing it gratis.

I even thought I could recognize his fine Italian hand in the interrogatories that were propounded to the 63 sea captains that the Senator from Ohio marshaled to prove that the doldrums off Panama were only mythical; or Mr. Lampre could render us valuable assistance in the discovery of who is the real owner of the Panama Canal property.

It may be that Mr. Cromwell can show to the counsel of the President the law that governs the queer state of the title to the property of the Panama Canal Company. As to this, I will read the latest contract, entered into by the decree of a French court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 2 o'clock p. m.) rapped with his gavel.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I have just one word to say in parting with this question. What I have had to do with it has been by the order of the Senate. The duty was assigned to me by the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I was a member. I saw the labor of it. I did not shrink from it. Two bills have been passed in the Senate even upon the Maritime Canal Company's route, one by 11 majority and the other by a vote of 48 to 6. Two bills have passed the House of Representatives in identical terms, at two different Congresses. So, Mr. President, if we are beaten down here to-day, if the subject is dismissed, if a canal is defeated and America disgraced, I shall have the honor, and my friends will give it to me after my death, of having it said that I devoted, honestly and sincerely, the best labors of my life to the success of the Isthmian Canal.

The paper Mr. MORGAN sent to the Clerk's desk, and was prevented from having read by the expiration of the time allowed for debate on the measure, is as follows:

Senator MORGAN. What is the next paper?

Mr. PASCO. The next paper is the agreement that was made in accordance with the order of the court.

Senator KITTREDGE. Between whom?

Mr. PASCO. Between the New Panama Canal Company and the liquidator. It was an arrangement made for the distribution of the proceeds of the sale when made. It was arranged that the proceeds should be divided by a court of arbitration.

Senator MORGAN. That paper should be included in the record.

The paper is as follows:

[Translation.]

Agreement between the Compagnie Nouvelle du Canal de Panama and the liquidation of the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique.

Between the undersigned: First, Mr. Jean Pierre Gautron, acting in his capacity of liquidator of the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique de Panama; second, the Compagnie Nouvelle de Panama, represented by Messrs. Marius Bô and Monvoisin, directors, by virtue of a resolution of the board of directors dated December 23, 1901:

It has been stated and agreed as follows:

STATEMENT.

By the terms of article 52 of the by-laws of the New Panama Canal Company "the profits of the enterprise, such as had been determined by article 51, were to be divided between the stockholders of the New Panama Canal Company and the liquidation of the Compagnie Universelle de Panama in the proportion of 40 per cent to the former and 60 per cent to the latter."

Senator MORGAN. That paper is not among those you have sent to the committee?

As negotiations may be opened for the sale of the Panama Canal enterprise to the Government of the United States of North America, a sale which would modify profoundly the conditions of its contribution to the enterprise, the liquidation of the Compagnie Universelle has held: First. That these negotiations could not be carried on without its intervention. Second. That the price of the sale could not be fixed except in agreement with the liquidation. Third. That the share to go to the liquidation in the said proceeds should be larger than the proportion fixed by article 52, on account of the damage suffered by the liquidation from the fact of the sale and the consequent abandonment of its rights to the eventual future profits of the enterprise.

While maintaining a contrary opinion upon these three points, the new company has admitted that, as a matter of fact, in default of a previous agreement with the liquidation, there might be difficulty in bringing the negotiations to a successful conclusion. It therefore proposed that the direction of the negotiations and the power to treat should be accorded to the new company, remarking, on the one hand, that they could with difficulty be conducted by two persons, and, on the other hand, that the pecuniary interests of the company, which, moreover, appears as alone invested with ownership, so far as third parties are concerned, gave all necessary guaranty to the liquidation for the conduct of the negotiations and their eventual conclusion; and it offered to submit to the decision of a tribunal of arbitration the third claim of the liquidation of the Compagnie Universelle.

Coinciding with these views, Mr. Gautron, liquidator of the Compagnie Universelle, in accord with Mr. Lemarquis, the judicial representative of the bondholders, on the one hand, and the New Panama Canal Company, on the other hand, have, under the advice of their counsel, entered into the following agreement:

AGREEMENT.

ARTICLE 1. The New Panama Canal Company alone remains charged with carrying on the negotiations. It shall have full powers to conclude eventually with the Government of the United States and to fix, after discussion with it, the price and conditions of the sale.

ART. 2. A tribunal of arbitration is hereby appointed, charged, from now on, with determining the proportions in which the proceeds of the sale shall be assigned to the New Panama Canal Company and to the liquidation of the Compagnie Universelle.

This tribunal of arbitration shall be composed of five members.

ART. 3 The new company designates Messrs. Du Buit and Léon Devin; Mr. Gautron, in his official capacity, designates on his side Messrs. Limbourg and Henri Thieblin.

The two parties have agreed to designate as fifth arbitrator Mr. Betolaud, late chairman of the bar association.

ART. 4. The arbitrators shall render their decision within the month which will follow the convening of the tribunal of arbitration.

They are freed from the rules and forms of procedure. They shall decide as amicable arbitrators, without appeal or recourse to the supreme court.

ART. 5. The present agreement is made:

First. So far as concerns the liquidator of the old company, by virtue of the authority to compromise, which was conferred upon him by the judgment of the chamber of the council of the civil tribunal of the Seine, dated August 2, 1901.

Second. So far as concerns the new company, by virtue of the powers which article 28 of the by-laws confers upon the board of directors, but subject to the final approval by the general meeting of shareholders of the conditions of the transfer to the United States Government.

CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA FOR THE REPUBLIC OF FRANCE.
At the City of Paris.

Gowdy, consul-general of the United States of America at Paris, France, residing therein, duly commissioned and qualified, personally appeared Marius Bô, president of the Compagnie Nouvelle de Panama; Fernand Monvoisin, vice-president of the Compagnie Nouvelle de Panama, and Jean Pierre Gautron, liquidator de l'ancienne Cie. du Canal Interocéanique de Panama, to me known, and known to me to be the individuals described in and who executed the within instrument, and severally acknowledged to me that they executed the same freely and voluntarily for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, as and for the act and deed of the above companies as therein expressed, and as such liquidator.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the consulate-general of the United States of America at Paris, aforesaid, the day and year above written.

[SEAL.]

JOHN K. GOWDY,
United States Consul-General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. There is an amendment pending, is there not? I have offered it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is an amendment in the form of a substitute.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the original text is first open to amendment and also the text of the substitute is open to amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the opinion of the Chair on a parliamentary question about the amendment.

The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as originally framed was offered in the Senate, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, acted upon by that committee, reported favorably to the Senate by a minority of the committee, called up and read in the Senate. I took the floor in advocacy of the bill, and I stated then what was true and not denied by anybody that the amendment was up for consideration. My point is that the amendment was therefore in the possession of the Senate, and if the Senator from Wisconsin desires to amend it, he must amend it as a paper that is in the possession of the Senate by offering his amendments seriatim and not by taking it out of the Senate and offering it again in bulk as a quite different paper from the other. That amendment has not been disposed of and is still in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no doubt that the Senator from Wisconsin has a right to offer an amendment, notwithstanding there may be an amendment reported by the minority of the committee, and he has a right to modify that amendment as he pleases, which he has done, and he can offer it at any time to the pending bill. The Senator from Massachusetts also has an amendment lying on the table. The fact that amendments are lying on the table, in the judgment of the Chair, does not necessarily involve that they are before the Senate for consideration. The Chair thinks that any Senator who has an amendment, whether it is on the table or not, should offer his amendment at the proper time.

Mr. SPOONER. When the bill was laid before the Senate this morning I offered the amendment, which I suppose is pending. Does the Chair hold that it must be reoffered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that it should be offered by the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. Then, I offer it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Because the Senator from Massachusetts had one lying on the table, offered as much as ten days ago.

Mr. SPOONER. That was an amendment intended to be offered, was it not? The first amendment which I submitted was one intended to be proposed. This morning, when the bill was laid before the Senate, I offered the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that it be reported.

Mr. SPOONER. I will reoffer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to acquire, for and on behalf of the United States, at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000, the rights, privileges, franchises, concessions, grants of land, right of way, unfinished work, plants, and other property, real, personal, and mixed, of every name and nature, owned by the New Panama Canal Company, of France, on the Isthmus of Panama, and all its maps, plans, drawings, records on the Isthmus of Panama and in Paris, including all the capital stock, not less, however, than 68,863 shares of the Panama Railroad Company, owned by or held for the use of said canal company, provided a satisfactory title to all of said property can be obtained.

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to acquire from the Republic of Colombia, for and on behalf of the United States, upon such terms as he may deem reasonable, perpetual control of a strip of land, the territory of the Republic of Colombia, not less than 6 miles in width, extending from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, and the right to use and dispose of the waters thereon, and to excavate, construct, and to perpetually maintain, operate, and protect thereon a canal, of such depth and capacity as will afford convenient passage of ships of the greatest tonnage and draft now in use, from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, which control shall include the right to perpetually maintain and operate the Panama Railroad, if the ownership thereof, or a controlling interest therein, shall have been acquired by the United States, and also jurisdiction over said strip and the ports at the ends thereof, to make such police and sanitary rules and regulations as shall be necessary to preserve order and preserve the public health thereon, and to establish such judicial tribunals as may be agreed upon thereon as may be necessary to enforce such rules and regulations.

The President may acquire such additional territory and rights from Colombia as in his judgment will facilitate the general purpose hereof.

SEC. 3. That when the President shall have arranged to secure a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company, as provided in section 1 hereof, and shall have obtained by treaty control of the necessary territory from the Republic of Colombia, as provided in section 2 hereof, he is authorized to pay for the property of the New Panama Canal Company $40,000,000 and to the Republic of Colombia such sum as shall have been agreed upon, and a sum sufficient for both said purposes is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid on warrant or warrants drawn by the President.

The President shall then cause to be excavated, constructed, and completed, utilizing to that end as far as practicable the work heretofore done by the New Panama Canal Company, of France, and its predecessor company, a ship canal from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean. Such canal shall be of sufficient capacity and depth as shall afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing through the same from ocean to ocean; and he shall also cause to be constructed such safe and commodious harbors at the termini of said canal, and make such provisions for defense as may be necessary for the safety and protection of said canal and harbors. That the President is authorized for the purposes aforesaid to employ such persons as he may deem necessary, and to fix their compensation.

SEC. 4. That should the President be unable to obtain for the United States a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company and the control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia and the rights mentioned in sections 1 and 2 of this act, within a reasonable time and upon reasonable terms, then the President, having first obtained for the United States perpetual control by treaty of the necessary territory from Costa Rica and Nicaragua, upon terms which he may consider reasonable, for the construction, perpetual maintenance, operation, and protection of a canal connecting the Caribbean Sea with the Pacific Ocean by what is commonly known as the Nicaragua route, shall cause to be excavated and constructed a ship canal and waterway from a point on the shore of the Caribbean Sea near Greytown, by way of Lake Nicaragua, to a point near Brito on the Pacific Ocean. Said canal shall be of sufficient capacity and depth to afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing through the same from ocean to ocean; and he shall also construct such safe and commodious harbors at the termini of said canal as shall be necessary for the safe and convenient use thereof, and shall make such provisions for defense as may be necessary for the safety and protection of said harbors and canal; and such sum or sums of money as may be agreed upon by such treaty as compensation to be paid to Nicaragua and Costa Rica for the concessions and rights hereunder provided to be acquired by the United States are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid on warrant or warrants drawn by the President.

The President shall cause such surveys as may be necessary for said canal and harbors to be made, and in making such surveys and in the construction of said canal may employ such persons as he may deem necessary, and may fix their compensation.

In the excavation and construction of said canal the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua, or such parts of each as may be made available, shall be used.

SEC. 5. That the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, toward the project herein contemplated by either route so selected.

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to enter into such contract or contracts as may be deemed necessary for the proper excavation, construction, completion, and defense of said canal, harbors, and defenses by the route finally determined upon under the provisions of this act. Appropriations therefor shall from time to time be hereafter made, not to exceed in the aggregate the additional sum of $135,000,000, should the Panama route be adopted, or $180,000,000 should the Nicaragua route be adopted.

SEC. 6. That in any agreement with the Republic of Colombia, or with the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, the President is authorized to guarantee to said Republic or to said States the use of said canal and harbors, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, for all vessels owned by said States or by citizens thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. SPOONER. I move to insert on page 4, line 1, after the word "use," the words "and such as may be reasonably anticipated."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HOAR. I wish to point out to the Chair the parliamentary condition. The amendment which I proposed the other day, and which is in print, was offered when the bill was up and was actually pending, as will be seen by looking at the RECORD. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin was one of which notice merely was given. But I do not desire to interfere with him in moving his amendment now. It was understood this morning that hereafter I should be at liberty to offer mine as a substitute for it, without anyone raising the question that we can not amend something the Senate has already adopted.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment being treated as the first amendment pending——

Mr. HOAR. I do not care about that.

Mr. SPOONER. But I should like to be permitted to perfect my proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair examined the Journal this morning and found that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts was the pending amendment. It was offered at least a week ago. But the request of the Senator from Massachusetts this morning that he be permitted to offer it in the Senate if the Spooner amendment should finally be adopted was agreed to, and the Chair did not then treat it as a pending amendment, but as being practically withdrawn for the time being.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to make a similar request in favor of the bill reported by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. I ask that I may have the right to offer it in the Senate as a substitute for whatever bill may be carried from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has that right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Whatever is reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate is open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that. I speak of the report of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, a bill which I want to offer as a substitute for the Spooner bill in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Isthmian Canals is the bill which is now before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. But there are two. I have reported two bills here. One has not been considered at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not aware of that.

Mr. CULLOM. Is the other bill on the Calendar?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; it is on the Calendar, waiting for its turn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have a vote.

Mr. SPOONER. The particular bill which we are considering now is the Hepburn bill practically, reported by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. COCKRELL. House bill 3110.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the bill before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to perfect my proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that I may have the privilege which was extended to the Senator from Massachusetts—to offer that bill as a substitute in the Senate for whatever bill may be carried from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate. I do not know what it may be.

Mr. SPOONER. I think perhaps we had better consider that when we reach it.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Alabama has a right to offer it in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to his amendment will be regarded as agreed to if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPOONER. On page 5, after the word "use," in line 5, I move to insert the words "and such as may be reasonably anticipated." These amendments I take from the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], which I think very wise in this particular.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 5, after the word "use," insert "and such as may be reasonably anticipated."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to page 6, line 7, to a matter which I am sure has escaped his attention.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes. On page 6, line 7, I move to strike out the words "Secretary of War" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "President."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is agreed to, without objection.

Mr. SPOONER. In line 7, on page 6, after the word "authorized," I move to insert the words "cause to be" and to change "enter" to "entered;" so as to read:

Is hereby authorized to cause to be entered into

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is agreed to. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin as amended.

Mr. BACON. I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. It is one of which I gave notice some days since.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 19, after the word "then," insert the words "through the Isthmian Canal Commission hereinafter authorized."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia desire to have his amendment offered as one amendment?

Mr. BACON. I think they should be treated as one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will be read entire.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 19, after the word "then," insert the words "through the Isthmian Canal Commission hereinafter authorized."

On page 4, line 23, after the word "shall," insert the words "through the said Isthmian Canal Commission."

On page 5, line 19, after the word "cause," insert the words "the said Isthmian Canal Commission to make."

An additional section to said amendment, to be known as section 7, as follows:

SEC. 7. That to enable the President to construct the canal and works appurtenant thereto as provided in this act, there is hereby created the Isthmian Canal Commission, the same to be composed of seven members, who shall be nominated and appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall serve until the completion of said canal, unless sooner removed by the President, and one of whom shall be named as the chairman of said Commission. Of the seven members of said Commission at least four of them shall be persons learned and skilled in the science of engineering, and of the four at least one shall be an officer of the United States Army, and at least one other shall be an officer of the United States Navy, the said officers respectively being either upon the active or the retired list of the Army or of the Navy. Said commissioners shall each receive as their compensation the sum of $10,000 per annum, and such additional allowance for actual expenses incurred as may be allowed by the President in his discretion. In addition to the members of said Isthmian Canal Commission, the President is hereby authorized through said Commission to employ in said service any of the engineers of the United States Army at his discretion, and likewise to employ any engineers in civil life, at his discretion, and any other persons necessary for the proper and expeditious prosecution of said work.

The compensation of all such engineers and other persons employed under this act shall be fixed by said Commission, subject to the approval of the President. The official salary of any officer appointed or employed under this act shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation provided by or which shall be fixed under the terms of this act. Said Commission shall in all matters be subject to the direction and control of the President, and shall make to the President annually and at such other periods as may be required, either by law or by the order of the President, full and complete reports of all their actings and doings, and of all moneys received and expended in the construction of said work and in the performance of their duties in connection therewith, which said reports shall be by the President transmitted to Congress. And the said Commission shall furthermore give to Congress, or either House of Congress, such information as may at any time be required either by act of Congress or by the order of either House of Congress. The President shall cause to be provided and assigned for the use of the Commission such offices as may, with the suitable equipment of the same, be necessary and proper, in his discretion, for the proper discharge of the duties thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. SPOONER. I should be glad if the Senator from Georgia could see his way clear to accept an amendment to his amendment providing that "said commissioners shall each receive such compensation as the President shall prescribe until the same shall have been fixed by the Congress."

Mr. BACON. I am perfectly willing to accept it, if desired.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, if agreeable to the Senator, I move to strike out in line 6, before the word "compensation," the words "as their;" and in the same line, after the word "compensation," to strike out "the sum of $10,000 per annum, and such additional allowance for actual expenses incurred as may be allowed by the President in his discretion," and to insert in lieu thereof, before the word "compensation," the word "such;" and in the same line, after the word "compensation," to insert the words "as the President shall prescribe until the same shall have been otherwise fixed by the Congress;" so that it will read:

Said commissioners shall each receive such compensation as the President shall prescribe until the same shall have been otherwise fixed by the Congress.

Mr. BACON. That simply makes it conform to the other amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. It strikes out the $10,000 and allowances and leaves it so that the President may fix the compensation until the Congress shall otherwise prescribe.

Mr. BACON. I agree to that.

Mr. SPOONER. It is accepted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia accepts the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, what good purpose——

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a point of order. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator is right. I was going to ask the Senator from Wisconsin what good purpose is sought to be accomplished by this amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I will say to the Senator a very good purpose.

Mr. BERRY. Debate is not in order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, as modified, on the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. On the amendment to the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask to have the modification read. It has not been read from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 6, after the word "receive," strike out the words "as their" and insert "such;" after the word "compensation," in the same line, strike out the words "the sum of $10,000 per annum, and such additional allowance for actual expenses incurred as may be allowed by the President in his discretion" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "As the President shall prescribe until the same shall have been otherwise fixed by the Congress."

So that as amended the paragraph will read:

Said commissioners shall each receive such compensation as the President shall prescribe until the same shall have been otherwise fixed by the Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCLAURIN of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I did not notice the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], with whom I have a general pair, and I therefore ask leave to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. GIBSON] is absent from the Senate and is paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KEARNS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER. As it does not cut off debate to submit the motion, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. Why not have a direct vote upon it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to lay upon the table the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

So the amendment of Mr. MALLORY to the amendment of Mr. SPOONER was rejected.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to offer one more amendment, using precisely the same language as in the amendment just voted upon, with the exception of making the time eighteen months instead of twelve months.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an amendment to the substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 16, of the amendment of Mr. SPOONER, after the words "reasonable terms," it is proposed to insert the following:

Or if the President of the United States, although he may be satisfied that a satisfactory title to the property described in section 1 of this act can be obtained, shall for any reason be of the opinion that it is not for the best interests of the United States to purchase said property from the New Panama Canal Company, or if for any reason it shall be his judgment that the best interests of the United States require that the canal should be constructed on what is known as the Nicaragua route, between Greytown, on the Caribbean Sea, and Brito, on the Pacific Ocean, via the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. McENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McLAURIN of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 42, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—42.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer another amendment to the substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, in line 18, after the word "President," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That although the President of the United States shall be satisfied that a satisfactory title to said property can be obtained, if in the judgment of the President he for any reason deems it inadvisable, having in view the best interests of the United States, to acquire for and on behalf of the United States the property particularly described in section 1 of this act, or if for any reason the President of the United States shall be of the opinion that the best interests of the United States will be subserved by the construction of the canal on what is known as the Nicaragua route, from Greytown, on the Caribbean Sea, to Brito, on the Pacific Ocean, via the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua, then he shall, having first obtained for the United States control of the necessary territory from the Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica upon terms which he may consider reasonable, for the construction, maintenance, operation, and protection of the canal connecting the Caribbean Sea with the Pacific Ocean by what is commonly known as the Nicaragua route, direct the Secretary of War to excavate and construct a ship canal and waterway from a point on the shore of the Caribbean Sea, near Greytown, by way of Lake Nicaragua, to a point near Brito, on the Pacific Ocean. Said canal shall be of sufficient capacity and depth to afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing through the same from Greytown to Brito; and the Secretary of War shall also construct such safe and commodious harbors at the termini of said canal as shall be necessary for the safe and convenient use thereof, and shall make such provisions for defense as may be necessary for the safety and protection of said harbors and canal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. BERRY. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I think it proper to state at this time that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS], who has kindly released me on this question. I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McENERY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BERRY (when Mr. TILLMAN'S name was called). The Senator from South Carolina is absent and is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. If the Senator from South Carolina were here, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to repeat that my colleague [Mr. DOLLIVER] is necessarily absent to-day. If he were present, he would vote "yea" on this amendment. He is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was absent when my name was called. I simply desire to say that had I been present I should have withheld my vote, owing to my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. Were he present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 34; as follows:

So Mr. SPOONER'S amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the amendment by substituting that which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts in the Senate offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, as soon as the same can economically and conveniently be done, to cause to be excavated and constructed a canal of such depth and capacity as will be sufficient for the movements of ships of the greatest tonnage and draft now in use, and such as may be required for any changes in such tonnage or draft as may be reasonably anticipated, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean by such route as may be selected by him, having satisfied himself of the right of the United States to construct and protect such canal. And he shall cause to be constructed or improved such harbors at either entrance to such canal as he shall deem necessary.

SEC. 2. That he shall have full authority to employ such agencies and to obtain such advice as he shall find necessary.

SEC. 3. That he is authorized to guarantee to any foreign country or state the use of such canal and harbors on such terms as may be agreed upon for all vessels owned by said states or citizens thereof.

SEC. 4. That he is further authorized to direct the Secretary of War to cause to be employed such engineering assistance from officers of the Army and Navy as the President shall think fit, and in general to require of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy the performance of such duties in carrying this act into effect as he shall deem expedient.

SEC. 5. That the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, toward the project herein contemplated. And the sums required by any contract which may be entered into as aforesaid shall be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be hereafter made, on warrants to be drawn by the President of the United States, not to exceed in the aggregate $180,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SCOTT (when the name of Mr. ELKINS was called). My colleague was called home unexpectedly. He authorized me to state that if he were here and this amendment came up he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCLAURIN of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON].

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 13, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—13.

Clapp,	Mitchell,	Perkins,	Stewart.
Hawley,	Morgan,	Platt, N. Y.
Hoar,	Nelson,	Quay,
Lodge,	Penrose,	Scott,

NAYS—62.

Depew,	Frye,	McLaurin, S. C.	Tillman.
Dillingham,	Gibson,	Money,
Dolliver,	Kearns,	Rawlins,
Elkins,	McEnery,	Simon,

So Mr. HOAR'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I propose the amendment which I send to the desk. I have modified it since it has been printed by striking out the word "twenty," in line 12, on page 1, and inserting "thirty," and by striking out lines 12, 13, 14, and 15, on page 2.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that the amendment which provides for raising money for the construction of the canal by the issue of bonds?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana offers an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time, as the proceeds may be required to defray expenditures authorized by this act (such proceeds when received to be used only for the purpose of meeting such expenditures), the sum of $130,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and to prepare and issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, and in denominations of $20 or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in gold coin at the pleasure of the United States after ten years from the date of their issue, and payable thirty years from such date, and bearing interest payable quarterly in gold coin at the rate of 2 per cent per annum; and the bonds herein authorized shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority: Provided, That said bonds may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par, under such regulations as he may prescribe, but no commissions shall be allowed or paid thereon; and a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of the bonds herein authorized is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expense of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to lay the amendment on the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCLAURIN of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 36, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Bacon,	Clay,	Jones, Ark.	Pettus,
Bailey,	Cockrell,	McLaurin, Miss.	Pritchard,
Bard,	Culberson,	Mallory,	Quay,

Depew,	Elkins,	McLaurin, S. C.	Tillman.
Dietrich,	Gibson,	Money,

So the Senate refused to lay on the table the amendment offered by Mr. FAIRBANKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BERRY and Mr. CULBERSON demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCLAURIN of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 38, nays 36; as follows:

Dietrich,	Gibson,	Money,	Tillman.
Dillingham,	Kearns,	Pritchard,
Dolliver,	McEnery,	Rawlins,

So Mr. FAIRBANKS'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I offer an amendment to the amendment which has just been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois offers an amendment to the amendment just agreed to. It will be stated.

Mr. MASON. I do not know that I have drawn the amendment properly. It is to be inserted in line 4, on the third page. It simply provides that when the bonds are issued all the citizens of the United States may have an equal opportunity for subscribing. There can be no use in making these $20 bonds unless there is some plan whereby it can be made a popular loan so as to give all the people a chance to buy the bonds, as we did in the original war loan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, of the amendment just adopted, line 6, after the word "prescribe" insert the words:

Giving to all citzens of the United States an equal opportunity to subscribe therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I have an amendment that I desire to offer. It is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama offers the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to conclude agreements with the Republics of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, or either of them, for and in behalf of the United States, for the acquiring and full control of such portion of territory now belonging to Costa Rica and Nicaragua as may be desirable and necessary on which to locate, construct, maintain, govern, regulate, police, and protect a canal of such depth and capacity as will be sufficient for the movements of ships of the greatest tonnage and draft, from a point near Greytown, on the Caribbean Sea, via Lake Nicaragua, to Brito, on the Pacific Ocean; and such sum as may be necessary to secure such necessary rights, privileges, and control is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is not this the bill which the Senate by a vote has just stricken out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama practically obtained unanimous consent to offer this amendment when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] obtained consent to offer his amendment. The Chair hopes the Senator from Rhode Island will not make any point against it.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCLAURIN of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 41, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—41.

Aldrich,	Fairbanks,	Jones, Nev.	Proctor,
Allison,	Foraker,	Kean,	Quarles,
Bard,	Foster, Wash.	Kittredge,	Scott,
Beveridge,	Frye,	Lodge,	Spooner,

Bacon,	Cockrell,	Mallory,	Platt, N. Y.
Bailey,	Culberson,	Martin,	Quay,

NOT VOTING—14.

Burnham,	Elkins,	McLaurin, S. C.	Stewart,
Depew,	Gibson,	Money,	Tillman.
Dillingham,	Kearns,	Rawlins,
Dolliver,	McEnery,	Simon,

So Mr. MORGAN'S amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. Nothing in this act shall be construed as approving or consenting to any part of the draft of the convention proposed by Señor Concha, minister of Colombia, to the Secretary of State on the 31st of March, 1902, or of the letter of William Nelson Cromwell, general counsel of the New Panama Canal Company, which accompanies the letter of Señor Concha and purports to be explanatory thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole as amended.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present. If I were not paired, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON (when Mr. DOLLIVER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. DOLLIVER] is necessarily absent and is paired on this question with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL (when Mr. SIMON'S name was called). I am authorized by my colleague [Mr. SIMON] to state that if he were here he would vote for the passage of the Spooner amendment if adopted, although he was against the amendment originally.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] and I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 67, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—67.

Aldrich,	Deboe,	Jones, Nev.	Penrose,
Allison,	Dietrich,	Kean,	Perkins,
Bacon,	Dryden,	Kittredge,	Platt, Conn.
Bailey,	Fairbanks,	Lodge,	Platt, N. Y.

NOT VOTING—15.

Clapp,	Elkins,	McEnery,	Stewart,
Depew,	Foster, Wash.	McLaurin, Miss.	Teller,
Dillingham,	Gibson,	Rawlins,	Tillman.
Dolliver,	Kearns,	Simon,

So the bill was passed.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill which has just been passed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I know that motion has sometimes prevailed in the Senate. Occasionally and rarely when an amendment has been adopted in the Senate to a House bill we have appointed conferees, but that has not been the recent practice, I understand, and I should hope that it might not be done now at this stage of the proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MORGAN, Mr. HANNA, and Mr. KITTREDGE were appointed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) amending "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the absence of objection.

Mr. HALE. Let that joint resolution lie on the table for the present. I think it is intended to be called up for action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none; and the joint resolution will lie upon the table instead of being referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I wish to have the joint resolution taken from the table in order that it may be considered at this time and be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution the title of which has been read.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I feel it to be my duty to object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. QUAY. I will withdraw the objection in a moment.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Very well.

OKLAHOMA, ARIZONA, AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to say, Mr. President, that on the 17th instant I gave notice that after we disposed of the bill just passed upon I would move to discharge the Committee on Territories from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. I now make that motion, and ask that it go over for consideration until Monday next by agreement. It is very probable that I shall not press the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to discharge the Committee on Territories from the further consideration of the bill named by him, and asks that the motion be received and lie over until Monday next, subject to the call of the Senator.

Mr. QUAY. Of course I can not take it out of the jurisdiction of the Senate, but I wish to have the motion come up in its order on Monday next, unless it be withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not hear the last statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. I stated that I desired the motion to go over until Monday next unless withdrawn.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senator made some qualification. I want to say that if the Senator from Pennsylvania shall withdraw that motion the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] will make a similar motion. I simply want the Senate to be advised of that fact.

Mr. QUAY. I accept service of notice, Mr. President. I now withdraw my objection to the joint resolution which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] desired to have considered.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which came from the House of Representatives and is upon the table. It will only take a minute, and it is important that it shall be acted upon now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) amending "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Army appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, when the bill was last before the Senate I made a motion to recede from one of the amendments of the Senate. I wish, if in order, to withdraw that motion, and to move, by the unanimous instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a full and free conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate insist upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask for a full and free conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont if this is not the bill that gave rise to a commission of peace between the two Houses?

Mr. PROCTOR. It is.

Mr. BAILEY. Has that commission performed its labors and reported?

Mr. PROCTOR. The chairman of that committee, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], is present. I can say, however, that the committee has had one formal and several informal meetings, and arrived at no agreement. The chairman stated to the Senate, in the absence of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that that committee of conference was still in existence and proposed at some time to make a report. This motion is aside from that entirely. It ignores the action of the House and asks for a full and free conference on all the amendments.

Mr. BAILEY. I myself have no disposition to raise an issue with the House, but it does appear to me that, if the Senate thought it worth while to dignify this question by the appointment of a special committee, it is worse than child's play now, while the matter is under consideration, to go on and dispose of the very bill that gave rise to the question.

Mr. HALE. Is it not worth while now, as the matter has been in controversy, as some feeling has been aroused, and as nothing has come out of it, to give the House an opportunity to agree to a full and free conference? That is all we propose to do.

Mr. BAILEY. If that is the purpose of the motion, I am more than willing to any arrangement that will adjust the difference between the two Houses.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that is just the purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere with the plans of the Military Committee, but, as I understand the status of this bill, it is that the House sent here a request for a conference with certain instructions. That was considered by the Senate an unwise and improper thing to do, and a committee to confer with the House was appointed. Now we propose to take another step, as I understand, by still further ignoring that message from the House and proposing a separate and independent conference. I merely express the opinion that it will only complicate the situation in which we are, but I do not wish to interfere with the matter.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] will prevail, for it is utterly impossible to make the situation any worse than it is.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the House of Representatives sent the Senate a message, and it was proposed to send a request to the House which totally ignores its former message. This course, it seems to me, will make a bad situation worse. We ought, sir, to dispose of that preliminary matter before we proceed with the bill itself; and yet, I repeat, for the second or third time, that I intend to accept any arrangement that is satisfactory to the committee and to the gentlemen who are familiar with this matter.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Texas will allow me, so far as the message the House sent us is concerned, that is in the hands of the conference committee—a peace commission, as the Senator styled it a few moments ago, and, I think, very appropriately. What they have done with the subject I do not know, but we have been waiting two or three weeks for a report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Four weeks.

Mr. FORAKER. We have had a report of progress, or rather a lack of progress, and in the meanwhile time is running on and the date is approaching when we must adjourn, when the close of the fiscal year is near at hand, and everybody is solicitous to have these appropriation bills become legal enactments, if they are to be such.

Now, the Senator from Vermont, under the instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, has made a motion that we shall ask the House for a full and free conference, in which we shall not issue any instructions to the House about our position or about our rules, or about what they shall do, but will simply proceed upon the theory that we have a right to make amendments to a bill that the House sends to us, and that we have a right, before those amendments are disposed of, to at least be heard in the usual parliamentary way through our conferees appointed to meet the representatives of the House. It seems to me that this is a step that ought to be taken, and I hope there will not be any objection to the motion made by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL.. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply want to state that I was not present this morning at the meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs when these instructions were given. I was necessarily compelled to be present in conference in the Committee on Appropriations, so that I am not responsible in any way for and took no part in the instructions that were given to the distinguished Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that, while this is not the proper way, possibly it is the best way out of this matter at the present time, and so I make no further protest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives and ask for a full and free conference with the House on the disagreeing votes thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. FORAKER, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

CONFERENCES AND CONFERENCE REPORTS.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I think it is quite important to the Senate and in the general interest, because there has developed more or less feeling, that the committee appointed by the Senate to confer with a similar committee from the House on the message of the House to the Senate requesting a conference should be a diplomatic committee—one which would endeavor to bring about an adjustment in a frank and friendly way.

Mr. FORAKER. And a successful result.

Mr. SPOONER. And the committee which was appointed, of which I happen to be the chairman, has made very honest effort—the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is on that committee—to adjust the matter. We have made no report, and I do not think at this time we ought to make any report; but I think it is important that some adjustment of this matter should be made between the two Houses.

Mr. President, I ask to be excused from further service as the chairman of the committee of conference on this message. I hope some one will be substituted who will have less diplomacy and less desire to bring about without friction an adjustment between the two Houses. I do not know of any man in the world whom I would regard as better fitted to accomplish that result than the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. [Laughter.]

It is true, just as the Senator from Ohio has stated, that we have had a number of conferences, and we have been able only to report progress, and to suggest that, if time were given us, we would endeavor to bring about an adjustment. It is a thankless task, and I am sick of it myself; so I ask to be excused—and I do not know but the Senator from Colorado will agree with me—from further service upon that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks to be excused from further service on the committee of conference. Is there objection?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORAKER. I rose to object, Mr. President. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] for the compliment he saw fit to pay me when he spoke of my diplomatic qualities. I appreciate that certainly; and I appreciate the further compliment that is involved in the suggestion that I could succeed where he has failed.

But, Mr. President, when I said a while ago that the situation could not by any possibility be any worse than it is I had reference to the fact that the most polite, courteous, and diplomatic member of this body, representing us on the conference, had utterly failed to do anything more than to report progress.

Mr. SPOONER. If there is any man in the world who I think can make the situation worse than it is, it is the Senator from Ohio. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. That may be true. I do not know; I would not deny it; but I know it would not require me as much time as the Senator from Wisconsin has taken to report and ask to be excused from further service.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin has given a good deal of time to this subject.

Mr. FORAKER. I know he has.

Mr. SPOONER. It is very important that the two Houses should be in accord. It is not a mere matter of etiquette; it is not a mere matter of prerogative; but it is a matter, in the last analysis, which is of vital public interest, and the committee appointed by the Senate—unhappily appointed by the Senate—has felt it was important, because of the feeling that has developed, to move along with a reasonable degree of lack of speed and a reasonable degree of moderate temperature toward an adjustment which would bring the two Houses in accord.

I assume that the Senator from Colorado agrees with me in this. Not one member of this Senate could be found to vote in favor of sending to the House a message like that which the House sent to us. I have thought, and I still believe, that this matter can be adjusted; but, Mr. President, I prefer very much that some other Senator—and I know of no one whom I would prefer to the Senator from Ohio—should undertake it; and I therefore persist in my request that I be excused from further service on that committee.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, in objecting to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin, to be excused from further service on this committee, I had only this in mind: So long as this committee continues I do not know any one who is a member of this body so well qualified as the Senator from Wisconsin to properly represent us, and I know that he has been laboring and doing all in his power to accomplish the result he was appointed to accomplish. It is a matter of surprise and a matter of regret to every member of this body that he has not been able to come back here and report an agreement of some kind that would be satisfactory to both Houses.

It did not occur, I am sure, to anybody here when this trouble commenced that there would be any difficulty beyond calling the attention of the House to the fact that the Senate, whether it was so or not, regarded that communication as disrespectful to the Senate. I am sure if the Senate had sent a message to the House which the House saw fit to regard as disrespectful, that the Senate would recall it, or the Senate would take appropriate action to show that no offense was intended. I thought the House would do that. We all spoke at that time in that spirit, and the committee was appointed in that spirit. We had no idea that through two or three long weeks our representatives would have to labor, and labor in vain, to accomplish a result which ought to have been conceded immediately, for certainly every man who is qualified to represent a constituency in the Congress of the United States knows that there can be no successful legislation that is not predicated upon polite intercourse between the two Houses and respectful consideration on the part of one House for the rights of the other.

Now, we have taken exception to the action of the House, and we appointed a committee to represent us and solve the problem that has arisen. We did that in the hope that an amicable ajustment might be reached, one that would not involve any humiliation to anybody; but that committee, not being able to report a successful result, and it becoming necessary, if there was to be a conference on the bill, that it should be proceeded with, the Senator from Vermont made a motion in that behalf. This morning he asked the opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs in regard to it, and by a unanimous vote that committee instructed him to ask——

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FORAKER. I do.

Mr. PETTUS. I want to correct the last statement made by the Senator from Ohio. I did not vote for the proposition to which he has referred.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the vote was a viva voce vote, and I thought every member of the committee voted for it. Of course I recall my statement that it was unanimous in view of what the Senator from Alabama now says, but this is the first intimation I have had that the Senator from Alabama did not vote with the rest of us to so instruct the Senator from Vermont.

But with that explanation, I proceed to say that the Senator from Vermont was instructed by the committee, by what I supposed was a unanimous vote, as the most likely way to bring about an amicable result, simply to make a motion that we insist upon our amendments and ask for a full and a free conference, a conference to which the representatives of the House would be invited, without any restrictions upon us in the consideration of any of the questions about which we had disagreed.

Now, it seems to me that this motion ought to prevail. It seems to me the House ought to be glad to appoint conferees to meet with us, and it seems to me that that is the simplest and best way out of the difficulty, if we have a difficulty. It does not interfere with the work of the committee of which the Senator from Wisconsin is chairman. They have charge of the message, and I hope they will keep it in hock where they have had it for the last two or three weeks.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, we declined to accede to the request of the House. We took another course, and appointed a committee. Now, if we chose to have a conference with the House we will have it on their terms, of course, and it seems to me we ought to get rid of this committee instanter. Therefore I have risen to suggest, so far as I am concerned, that I desire to withdraw from the committee. I think we all ought to withdraw. Then the Senate can take such action as it sees fit. I do not think it is in order for us to have this committee out and then take the proceedings proposed to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I felt when I made the suggestion that it was not proper, while the committee had under consideration this question between the two Houses, for the Senate to take the very matter over which the controversy arose out of dispute and proceed with it in another way. Still, as long as it did not appear objectionable to the committee, I did not do any more than utter a mild protest.

But I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that the time may come when this matter may be of real importance. Indeed, a time might come when a division of political parties in this Chamber and in the other branch of Congress might imperil necessary legislation if we proceed along this line.

Of course we understand that each House controls its own conferees, and I will not go so far as to suggest that much of this difficulty originates in a practice of respecting seniority of committee service in the appointment of conferees, instead of appointing a conference committee composed at least in the majority of those who support the action of the House for which they are appointed. But while each House has the right to control its own conferees and can instruct them, and under given circumstances ought to instruct them, yet the practice of either House saying to the other before a full conference has been had that it insists upon its decision is equivalent to saying, "You will agree to my terms or a conference is fruitless."

That such proceedings must interrupt the friendly intercourse between the two Houses is obvious to the dullest man, because, as is well suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, that defeats the very purpose of a conference, which is to bring the two Houses to an agreement, and if one House say, "We will not agree at all unless you agree to our action," the other House, as a matter of self-respect, will decline a conference upon such terms.

I therefore believe it is of the utmost importance that this committee shall reach some ground acceptable to both Houses before we take this matter out of their hands and proceed with it in a manner, which, if I were a member of the House, would be more offensive to me than the House message was to me as a Senator, because we ignore a message from them, while they simply advised us in advance that there could be no agreement except upon their terms.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. It occurs to me that the Senator from Texas was not in the Chamber when this matter was up a few days ago.

Mr. BAILEY. It is certain I was not.

Mr. FORAKER. We had quite a little debate about it, and at that time I took the position the Senator from Texas does—that is, I made inquiry as to whether or not the committee of conference appointed on the message had yet made a report, and I was solicitous for fear we might be impinging on their jurisdiction. But I was assured that the bill was one thing and the message another, and that we could proceed with the conference on the bill without interfering with the rights of the conference committee on the message. That was the first assurance.

When I found that it was perfectly satisfactory to all who were on the committees that we should proceed in that way, I addressed myself to finding out whether or not anything had been accomplished. When I became satisfied nothing had been and that in all probability nothing could be accomplished, and that the diplomatic gentlemen who represented us were perhaps holding back the report only for fear it might make a bad matter worse, I then began to feel that we ought to act on the bill without regard to the message.

At that time no one who took a different view of the matter from what I did seemed to think we were ignoring the message. It was in the hands of the committee, just as it is now. We have advised the House as to the message, and they have responded to it.

Mr. BAILEY. The trouble is that the only response we have made to the message was the notice that we had appointed a committee to join a similar committee from the House in considering that.

Mr. FORAKER. And the House appointed a committee.

Mr. BAILEY. And they appointed a committee. Now, with that message under consideration by the two committees, we propose to take action in respect to the very origin of the dispute without a word as to what has become of the difference over which we are conferring by a separate committee.

Mr. FORAKER. That is just what we were assured the other day we could do with propriety and without interference.

[At this point Mr. BAILEY yielded to a number of Senators to present routine morning business.]

CONSOLIDATED INDEX OF UNITED STATES STATUTES.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to submit a resolution for which I request present consideration.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on the Judiciary cause to be prepared a consolidated index to the United States Statutes at Large from March 4, 1789, to March 3, 1903.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read again.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not object, but I did not yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I did not know the Senator from Texas had the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes. I only make that statement for the purpose of excusing myself to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], to whom I promised to yield.

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask the Senator from Texas to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BAILEY. This matter can be disposed of, and I will keep my agreement to yield to the Senator from Nevada, and then I will yield to the Senator from Vermont.

I want to seize this opportunity to say that I have never known a body as enlightened as this is to preserve such an absurd rule as that one which requires us to stand up here and interrupt each other for the sake of introducing bills and petitions. In the other House a gentleman desiring to introduce a bill can take it and deliver it to the Clerk, and it is introduced. The country does not heed us when we stand up in the open Senate to introduce our bills. But this performance goes on from day to day, and some time, just to illustrate the absurdity of the rule, I intend to stand here for thirty days and object to any bill being introduced except in the usual morning hour, and I will have that rule changed before the thirty days are half gone.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Texas permit me?

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator from Texas allow me?

Mr. BAILEY. I am under promise to yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PROCTOR. I will be only a moment.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. I had read from the desk a few moments ago a resolution for which I asked immediate consideration. It will take but a moment. It has been read once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. The resolution has been read, and I ask that it be read again for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will again be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on the Judiciary cause to be prepared a consolidated index to the United States Statutes at Large from March 4, 1789, to March 3, 1904.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it go over.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw his objection in order that I may say a word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from New Hampshire, I understand, withdraws his objection to the consideration of the resolution, in order that I may make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again submit the request. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Massachusetts desires to make a statement concerning the resolution. I do not know whether I shall object after hearing his statement.

Mr. STEWART. I object.

Mr. HOAR. It will take but ten seconds, and I am going away to-morrow.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; I withdraw the objection.

Mr. HOAR. This work is imperatively needed. There is no index, none having been made for many years, by which the Judiciary Committee or anybody else can find the old statutes and the history of our legislation. The resolution is approved by the Judiciary Committee. The work will be done by the clerk, who is a very competent person, and the question whether he shall receive any compensation, and if so, what, will depend on what the Senate thinks as to the necessity of the work after it is completed. There is no provision for any payment. The work will be done under the direction of the committee in the vacation, and then the Senate, if it thinks any compensation necessary, can refer the matter to the Committee on Contingent Expenses or any other committee, as it sees fit.

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CONFERENCES AND CONFERENCE REPORTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island will state his point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Texas has been making two speeches——

Mr. GALLINGER. Three.

Mr. ALDRICH. He has been speaking upon two subjects, neither of which is before the Senate. There is no business before the Senate at all. The Senator from Texas is proceeding by unanimous consent, and he is simply——

Mr. BAILEY. The first time I ever tried to address the Senate the Senator from Rhode Island took me from the floor on just such a point of order as that. He will not do it this time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have the Chair state what is the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. BAILEY. To be excused from further service on the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And of the Senator from Colorado to be excused from further service on the committee of conference on the message of the House of Representatives in respect to the Army bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is that a debatable question?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it what?

Mr. ALDRICH. Is it a debatable question?

Mr. SPOONER. It is a question of privilege.

Mr. PROCTOR. I have been trying for half an hour to say about ten words.

Mr. STEWART. Say them.

Mr. PROCTOR. I should like to know if I can have the privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Texas last week I called up the bill and made a motion to recede from the amendment to which the House objected and to ask a conference on the remaining amendments, which I think would have been agreed to without any instruction. That motion did not seem to meet with favor, and it was suggested that I held out the olive branch to the other body too strongly. Those who favored holding out the butt end of the olive branch seemed to be in the majority.

This morning, in the Committee on Military Affairs, the matter was brought up, and I was instructed to make the motion I did by what I took to be a unanimous vote—at least no one dissented. I did not myself vote because I did not quite believe in the measure. But I obeyed the direction.

I agree substantially on general grounds with the views of the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Colorado, as I understand them. I trust that the Senator from Wisconsin will not be excused from further serving on the conference committee, or if he is to be excused, that the whole committee be discharged from the further consideration of the question. One or the other course—not to excuse him or to discharge the whole committee—is certainly the right way.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Only a moment. It is not exactly wise, I think, to treat with levity this apparent issue—I will speak of it as an apparent issue—between the two Houses. I think there ought to be none; but there seems to be one, and around it has developed more or less of feeling. The conference committee, standing all of the time by the prerogatives of the Senate and, I think, the dignity of the Senate, has endeavored to bring about an adjustment which would secure harmony and cooperation between the two Houses. If the Committee on Military Affairs thinks it wise—and that is a matter entirely for the Committee on Military Affairs to decide—to proceed by vote with the question of conference on the military bill, it is quite right; it is entirely within their prerogative, and it may be the wise thing to do. But if that is to be done, and I have no objection in the world to its being done, the committee of conference on the message will deal with a pure abstraction, a mere matter of abstract etiquette, of politeness.

Mr. President, we could have reached a conclusion in twenty minutes, and it would have been the easiest thing in the world, which would have involved the two Houses, under the circumstances, in an issue which would have lasted, I think, for some time, and which would have been creditable to neither from the standpoint of the popular interest nor its interest in these bodies. We made progress. I was as frank as I could be the other day when I stated that we were not ready to report. I do not know that we would be ready in a week from now. We intended to proceed, and we have proceeded; but I think the time has come, in view of the action of the Committee on Military Affairs, for this committee no longer to proceed. Therefore, Mr. President, withdrawing my request to be excused from service as a member of the committee——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Pardon me. And also, if I have leave of the Senator from Colorado, withdrawing his request to be excused from further service upon that committee, I move, in order to make the pathway clear for the Committee on Military Affairs, that the committee of conference appointed some days ago by the Senate to confer with a similar committee from the House be discharged from further duty in that relation.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to withhold that motion for a moment until I can keep my agreement to yield to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], and then I am through.

Mr. SPOONER. For that purpose I withhold the motion.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

LOUISIANA AND TEXAS RAILROAD AND STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to call up a bill to remove the statute of limitation. I wish to state in half a minute what the bill is. The railroad company named in the bill was treated by the Post-Office Department as a land-grant road.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the name of the company named in the bill?

Mr. STEWART. It is Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company, a company in Texas. The railroad company named in the bill was treated by the Department as a land-grant road, and 20 per cent of the pay for the service retained. It had no subsidy. There had been some legislation in regard to it, but it did not get any grant.

The company brought suit against the Government for the money which was kept back and recovered it. The court held that it was not a land-grant road. Since that time it has been paid in full the same as all other roads, but while that suit was pending and before it was decided a portion of the compensation became outlawed. The effect of this bill is to remove the statute of limitations so that the accounting officers may pay what was omitted. The bill is recommended by the Department, and it comes from the Committee on Claims after having passed the House.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the bill be read.

Mr. HOAR. It is to be paid on the principle of the decision of the court?

Mr. STEWART. On the same principle they are now paying that company. It was not paid, because while the litigation was pending a portion of it became outlawed. It is House bill 4636.

Mr. SPOONER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 4636) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company for transporting the United States mails.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the report be read first. I reserve the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, submitted by Mr. STEWART on the 22d ultimo, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4636) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company for transporting the United States mails, having considered the same, beg to report as follows:

This claim has been twice before your committee in the shape of amendments to appropriation bills, and twice favorably reported. Your committee again concur in the views contained in the above-mentioned reports, adopt them as a part hereof, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The reports are as follows:

[Senate Report No. 995, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to state an account with Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company for transporting the United States mails over postal routes Nos. 3301 and 49003, having considered the same, report as follows:

This amendment is fully explained by reports from both the Senate and House Committees on Claims, which are hereto attached for the information of the Committee on Appropriations.

[Senate Report No. 688, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the amendment of Mr. KEAN proposed to be offered to the sundry civil appropriation bill, have had the same under consideration and report as follows:

The claimant, the Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railway and Steamship Company, own and operate a railroad between New Orleans, La., and Morgan City, La., a distance of 80.37 miles, and have, ever since July 1, 1878, been carrying the United States mails over its road under the orders and directions of the Postmaster-General. It has received for the transportation of such mails only 80 per cent of the statutory price, 20 per cent having been withheld on the alleged ground that the road was a land-grant road, and it was so treated in its payment by the United States.

The facts are that by the act of June 3, 1856 (11 Stat., 18), certain lands were proposed to be granted to the State for the purpose of aiding in the construction of such a road, provided that the road was built within ten years. The road was not built within the time, and Congress, by the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat., 277), forfeited the grant, and no lands were ever received by the company.

The company brought suit in the Court of Claims for the difference, and upon a full hearing the court held that the company was not a land-grant road and was entitled to the statutory rates for transportation of the mail, and rendered judgment in favor of the company for the period within six years prior to bringing the suit, but was without jurisdiction to render judgment for any period prior thereto.

This amendment authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to audit the account for the period of time that the company was paid land-grant rates that the court decided it was entitled to the full statutory rates, and which was barred from its jurisdiction.

The amendment is in the form recommended by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General under date of February 2, 1899.

The committee therefore report back the amendment and recommend that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to be incorporated in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

[House Report No. 796, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4636) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company for transporting the United States mails, have had said bill under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

By an act of Congress approved June 3, 1856, a grant of land was made to the State of Louisiana for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from New Orleans, La., by Opelousas, to the State line of Texas; and afterwards, in pursuance of said act, the State of Louisiana, by an act of March 16, 1857, granted said lands to the New Orleans, Opelousas and Great Western Railroad Company. This act contained provisions for the forfeiting of said land in case the road was not completed within ten years.

The railroad contemplated by said act not having been completed within the ten years, Congress, by an act of July 14, 1870, declared all lands granted by said act for the construction of this road forfeited to the United States; and afterwards the State of Louisiana, for the purpose of carrying into effect the act of forfeiture, released to the United States on behalf of said State, by quitclaim deed, all the lands granted to said company.

After the expiration of the ten years the road was built on the lines provided in said grant, but owing to the failure of the company to build within the ten years, by an act of Congress of July 14, 1870, the lands reverted to the United States Government and never inured to the benefit of said railroad company or its successors or assigns.

Under a United States marshal's sale on May 25, 1869, Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company acquired all the rights to said land and to the road constructed or to be constructed through said grant formerly claimed by the New Orleans, Opelousas and Great Western Railroad Company.

The claimant, Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company, operated said road between New Orleans, La., and Morgan City, La., a distance of 80.37 miles, and have, since July 1, 1878, been carrying the United States mails over its road, under regulations made with the Postmaster-General. During this time it received for transporting such mails only 80 per cent of the statutory price, that being the price paid to land-grant companies, the 20 per cent having been withheld because it was alleged that it was a land-grant road, and it was so treated in its payment by the United States.

Said company, claiming that it was entitled to full nonland-grant rates for carrying the mails, on the 5th day of June, 1888, commenced an action in the Court of Claims against the United States for the purpose of recovering the 20 per cent which it claimed it was entitled to receive for carrying the mails over the lines of this road for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1882, 1883, and 1884.

No action was taken on this petition until during the year 1898. On the 21st day of February, 1898, the claimant filed a supplemental petition alleging that it was entitled to the 20 per cent withheld by the Government, or, in other words, that it was entitled to compensation for carrying the mails at nonland-grant rates from July 1, 1878, to December 31, 1897.

On the original petition, filed June 5, 1888, and the supplemental petition of February 21, 1898, the court, after hearing and trial, made a return in that case of a finding of law and fact, a copy of which is appended to this report and made a part of it.

By that decision it was determined by the court that the road was a nonland-grant road and that the claimant was entitled to recover for carrying the mails at full contract prices allowed to nonland-grant roads, and that it was therefore entitled to recover the 20 per cent of compensation that had been retained by the Post-Office Department; but the original petition in that case only having claimed compensation for the years 1882, 1883, and 1884, gave judgment for the claimant for the sum of $6,348.04, the amount still due the company for those years, and the supplemental petition having been filed more than ten years after the original petition, the court further held that it only had jurisdiction on the supplemental petition to determine the amount due the claimants for the six years immediately preceding the filing of the said supplemental petition, and on that basis gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $22,396.79 as additional compensation due for the six years from February 21, 1892, up to December 31, 1897, leaving undetermined the additional compensation due the claimants for all that period from July 1, 1878, up to February 21, 1892, except for the years 1882, 1883, and 1884, which were adjudicated under the litigation on the original petition filed in said case, on the ground that the same were barred by the statute of limitations.

The purpose of this bill, therefore, is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to state an account with the said company for these several years for transporting the mails over its line of road, for which it has only been paid at land-grant rates, and to pay to the company whatever amount may be found to be due, without interest. The Post-Office Department has recognized the decision of the Court of Claims, above referred to, that this is a nonland-grant road, and it would seem that no other conclusion upon the facts could be arrived at.

The Post-Office Department, in recognition of the decision of the court, has adjusted the compensation with the railroad company for the carrying of the mails over its line since the 1st day of January, 1898.

On the foregoing facts, which are conclusively established, your committee are of the opinion that the bar of the statute of limitations ought to be removed and the Secretary of the Treasury authorized to state an account with the company and ascertain what is actually due by reason of the Government having retained 20 per cent for the period named, and pay the amount actually found due.

Your committee therefore report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONFERENCES AND CONFERENCE REPORTS.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I move that the committee appointed by the Senate some days ago on the message from the House on the Army appropriation bill be discharged. It is late to-day, and I am quite willing that the motion shall go over until some time to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator had better not make the motion now, and have it go into the RECORD. There may be some change of view about it.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is in the RECORD now.

Mr. TELLER. We have already put it in the RECORD. The fact is that the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] was agreed to, and it will go into the RECORD as having been agreed to. I insist that this committee ought to be discharged.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I wish to say just one word before the course suggested is taken.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let me make a suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SPOONER. Of course.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator made a remark a few moments ago to the effect that he was of the opinion that the committee ought to be discharged in view of the action taken by the Committee on Military Affairs. I want to say on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs that I am sure no member of the committee had a thought, when that action was taken, of interfering with this committee. They had no such thought, because when this matter came before the Senate a few days ago that very point was raised. It was insisted by the Senator from Vermont and I think also by the Senator from Wisconsin and others that the bill and the message were two separate and independent matters for consideration, and that proceeding with the one did not interfere with the other.

The proposition of the Senator from Vermont then was exactly what his proposition is to-day, except only that to-day it is modified. To-day he insists upon all these amendments being considered, instead of receding from one of them. Certainly there was as much interference with the prerogative or the jurisdiction of the committee on the message to proceed in the way proposed a few days ago as there is to proceed in the way now proposed. So it never occurred to anybody that the action of the Committee on Military Affairs would be taken as ground for such a motion as that which the Senator has made.

I was hoping the Senator from Wisconsin would continue where I think he can render a very important service, because I am sure he can render it if any member of this body can render it. I think that would be a better course.

I have had no disposition, responding again to a thought expressed by the Senator a moment ago, to treat this subject with levity. I think it is a serious matter. I have been disposed, I was afraid, to treat it too seriously from the beginning. I have been in earnest about it. I am in earnest about it now, and I expect to remain in earnest about it to the end.

I have no light remarks to make on the subject. I think we ought to act like men. We ought to act like self-respecting men, but men who respect also those with whom we must concurrently transact the public business. I believe if we do so act we can work out a solution of this question that will be acceptable to both Houses. Certainly no one here wants to humiliate anybody there, and for one I am determined, so far as I can prevent it, that nobody there shall humiliate anyone here. Speaking for myself, there will be a full and free conference or there will be none.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Colorado that they withdraw the action they now suggest for a while until we find what the House will do with the request made to-day for a full and free conference. If the House either ignore their original message or withdraw it and accept the invitation of the Senate for a full and free conference, then the question is practically disposed of and there will probably be no controversy between the two Houses. On the other hand, if they should refuse to accept our request for a full and free conference, and stand upon their original message or upon some modification of it, then certainly there is reason for the existence of the committee of which the Senator from Wisconsin is chairman. I certainly hope he will not press at this time the motion which he has suggested.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SPOONER. Always.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this matter seems to me to be a very grave one. I do not want, of course, to have any difficulties arise between the two Houses, but the House of Representatives sent us a message which, if like messages became a practice, enables the House of Representatives to be free in all future conferences and the Senate to be restricted and bound. When that message came in there was no Senator who spoke who did not regard that as a very serious proceeding. But the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], reenforced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], two Senators of great experience and authority, who are charged by the Senate with a class of legislation about which conferences are most frequently necessary, said we should let it pass; that it was a mere inadvertence and we would not hear of such a thing again; and we let it pass. Then came the message in regard to the Army appropriation bill, in which the House implied, "We want you to give your conferees a free hand to yield, but we, in regard to one subject, will never yield."

It seemed to me that the proper thing to do was simply to send a message to the House asking for a free conference and let the House determine whether they would grant a free conference. But the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], having charge of this important Army appropriation bill, was very anxious that we should make a separate matter of that and have a committee, which was raised, to allow him to go on with his Army bill, if he could, under the existing message of the House. I withdrew very reluctantly the motion which I had made, because I did not like to interfere with the Senator in his action in regard to so important a responsibility.

Now, what is the result? It is now proposed to go on, as I understand it, with the Army appropriation bill, and to discharge the committee headed by the chairman of the Committee on Rules, which is supposed to have some special duties about the general procedure, in which the whole thing is practically going to disappear, and we are going to give our assent.

It is well enough to speak with great frankness. The Senators who have charge of these great appropriation bills have a certain temptation in this matter not to stand upon the ceremonies which preserve the dignity of the Senate. They are thinking of what they have got to do, and they want to accomplish that and get through and get away. We all know how it is in a conference. The Senate will have the most earnest and zealous debate, and by a strong majority it will declare that it is the opinion of the Senate that some amendment to a House bill ought to be adopted. It represents the earnest desire of the Senate, just as this thing seems to have been done, if I can judge of what has been said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. But we find the day before a final adjournment there comes in a report with 60, 70, or 100 disagreements disposed of in conference, and nobody seems to have cared much about the earnest opinion of the Senate.

I think if we should once in a while have somebody who is a little less amiable and a little less yielding in such matters, perhaps the Senate would have a little more authority in legislation than it has now. We do not want to stand anywhere except on an equality with the House. But when the Constitution of the United States gave them the great authority to say whether there should be an appropriation bill at all, it said that we might propose amendments, and added, in order that we should not be restricted, as they are in the English Parliament, to amendments merely germane or connected with the particular proposition, that we should propose amendments as in other bills, meaning that we should have as absolutely unrestricted authority as could possibly exist.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HOAR. Now, I insist that we stand by our guns. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PETTUS. I merely want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he is confounding an appropriation bill with a revenue bill.

Mr. HOAR. I am not confounding an appropriation bill with a revenue bill. The Constitution of the United States said revenue bills, it is true, but the House very early declared that, in principle and substance, included all general appropriation bills, because under legislative practices, both in this country and elsewhere, a bill which made large general appropriations required provision for expenditure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish the sentence. Because an appropriation bill required provision for the expenditure, and therefore that the two subjects were inseparably pending, the House insisted on its position. The Senate denied it, but Mr. Webster, who was the champion of the Senate's side and utterly denied the correctness of the position of the House, said that whatever might be the right and wrong of the question it was a matter of which the House must, from the necessity of the case, be the judge, for the very obvious reason that if we introduce a general appropriation bill and they say they will not consider it because it could not constitutionally originate here, we can not help ourselves. We can not retaliate by saying we will not consider an appropriation bill originating there, because we do not deny their power to originate appropriation bills. Therefore the Senate yielded, and it has been the uniform practice ever since. There has not been a general appropriation bill, I suppose, introduced in the Senate for thirty years. There has not been one introduced in the Senate for fifty years except when some Senator thought he would renew this old controversy, and it never has been pressed.

Mr. ALDRICH. The question which the Senator from Massachusetts has suggested has been up between the two Houses a great many times in the history of this country, and the Senate has never conceded for a moment that it could not originate appropriation bills of any kind or of any size.

Mr. HOAR. But it never originated them.

Mr. ALDRICH. It has originated hundreds and thousands of them.

Mr. HOAR. Not general appropriation bills.

Mr. ALDRICH. There never was a general appropriation bill until a comparatively recent period.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, there was. The matter came up when I was in the House thirty years ago.

Mr. ALDRICH. I remember that.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Webster distinctly declared that the House necessarily must settle that question. The Senate never has held to its power to originate such appropriation bills as those in regard to which the House denied the power.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Senate has reasserted its power a great many times since Mr. Webster's report.

Mr. HOAR. I know, but they never stuck. They never prevailed in the assertion. Mr. Webster said we had the constitutional power. Mr. President, here are 13 or 14 great appropriation bills. The number in the way they are counted now I do not know, but there were 13 until recently. It would be immensely agreeable and convenient in legislation to have the House take a half dozen of them and the Senate a half dozen of them at the beginning of the short session and go on and get them ready. But we do not do it.

The House originates them, every one, and we wait until they send them over here. We do our work with great speed. We have a great advantage. The House I think has hurt its own authority by insisting on that course, because the appropriation bills come over here and they are discussed at great length and amended. Then they get into conference just at the end of the session and the House do not have much means of knowing what is in the appropriation bill by way of amendment except the members of the House who are on the conference committee. The effect of it is that the real authority on almost everything in legislation is the Senate and three or four members of the House of Representatives, who are important men on their Appropriations Committee and so get on to conferences. That is the substance of it. Until the House made a change in its rules within a very few years, the last man to inquire of as to what is in an appropriation bill the day after the adjournment, is a member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SPOONER. I think, Mr. President, that it would be better that this motion should go over until to-morrow. I think it is a matter of very grave concern. I know it has given serious concern to every member of this committee of conference, and we had better take it up when more Senators are present. I ask that the motion go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the motion go over until to-morrow? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. For what purpose?

Mr. BURTON. I want the Senate to pass a bill which I have been trying to get up two or three times.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. BURTON. It is a bridge bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield for that purpose, and then I will renew my motion for an executive session.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6070) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at a point to be selected, within 5 miles north of the Kaw River, in Wyandotte County, State of Kansas, and Clay County, State of Missouri, and to make the same a post route.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out sections 2 and 3, as follows:

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be constructed and built without material interference with the security and convenience of the navigation of said river beyond what is necessary to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted; and in order to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a plan, design, and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving for the space of 1 mile above and 1 mile below the proposed location the topography of the banks of the river, the shore line at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans it shall have three or more channel spans of not less than 300 feet each in the clear, and shall not be of less elevation in any case than 50 feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of said river, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river and not less than 300 feet in length in the clear: Provided also, That if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a drawbridge the same shall be constructed as a pivot drawbridge, with the draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of not less than 160 feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining span or spans to the draw shall not be less than 300 feet, and the headroom under such span shall not be less than 10 feet above high-water mark: Provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats, and said company or corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed, upon receiving such plan, map, and other information, and upon being satisfied that the bridge built upon such plan and with such accessory works and at such locality will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act, to notify said company or corporation that he approves the same; and upon receiving such notification said company or corporation may proceed to the erection of said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location, and should any change be made in the plan of the bridge or said accessory works during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction of the free navigation of said river caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the circuit court of the United States of the district where said bridge or any part thereof is located.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the said railroad company, its successors or assigns, be built as a drawbridge or with unbroken and continuous spans: Provided, That if the same shall be made of unbroken and continuous spans it shall not be in any case of less elevation than 50 feet above high-water mark, as registered since the year 1870, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest point of the superstructure, with straight girders; nor shall the main channel span of said bridge be less than 400 feet in the clear at low-water mark, and all other spans over the waterway shall be not less than 300 feet in the clear; and the piers of the said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river, and the bridge itself at right angles thereto as near as may be, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river: And provided also, That if a bridge shall be built under this act as a drawbridge the same shall be constructed as a pivot drawbridge with one or more draws, as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and with spans of such clear length on each side of the central or pivot piers of the draws as he may prescribe; and the next adjoining spans over the river to the draws shall also be of such clear length as he may prescribe; and said spans shall not be less than 10 feet above extreme high-water mark, as registered since the year 1870, measuring to the lowest part of the superstructure of the bridge; and the piers of the said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river, and the bridge itself at right angles thereto as near as may be: And provided also, That said drawbridge shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal and without unnecessary delay: Provided, That said company, its successors and assigns, shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset until sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe, and shall build and maintain such sheer booms or other structures as may be necessary to safely guide vessels, rafts, or other water craft through said channel spans and as shall receive the approval of the Secretary of War: And provided further, That the company, person, or corporation building said bridge may, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, enter upon the banks of said river, either above or below the point of location of said bridge, and confine the flow of the water to a permanent channel and to do whatever may be necessary to accomplish said object, but shall not impede or obstruct the navigation or flood discharge of said river, and shall be liable for all injuries to or appropriation of private property; and all plans for such works or erections upon or within the banks of the river shall be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval before any of such work shall have been commenced.

SEC. 3. That no bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river, and no bridge shall be commenced or built under this act until the location thereof and the plans and specifications for its construction, with such maps as shall be necessary for a full understanding of the regimen of the river for a distance of 1 mile above and one-half mile below the proposed site of the bridge, shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War; and any change in the plan of such construction or any alteration in the bridge after its construction shall be subject to the like approval; and whenever said bridge shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, substantially obstruct the free navigation of said river, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will obviate such obstruction, and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions shall be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridge or the persons operating or controlling the same; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of the Missouri River, at or near the crossing of said bridge, caused thereby, the cause shall be commenced and tried in the circuit court of the United States of either judicial district of the States of Kansas or Missouri in which said bridge or any portion of such obstruction touches.

The amendment was agreed to,

The next amendment was, in section 5, on page 8, line 9, after the word "postal-telegraph," to insert "and telephone;" and in line 10, after the word "control," to insert "and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the United States shall have the right of way for such postal-telegraph and telephone lines across said bridge as the Government may construct or control, and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, on page 9, line 5, after the word "Congress," to strike out "shall have power" and insert "may;" in line 6, before the word "alter," to strike out "to;" in the same line, before the word "amend," to strike out "or," and after the word "amend" to insert "or repeal;" and in the same line, after the word "act," to strike out—

So as to prevent or remove all material and substantial obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of said bridge and its accessory works, and the expense of altering said bridge or removing such obstructions shall be borne by the owners of or persons controlling such bridge;

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That Congress may, at any time, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 8. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within two years and completed within four years from the date of the approval of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WIND CAVE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], to my knowledge, have been waiting for several days to pass unobjected bills. I yield to these two Senators, and then I shall renew my motion for an executive session.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6138) to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota as a public park, to be known as the Wind Cave National Park.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota what provision has been made for those settlers who are on the proposed reservation?

Mr. GAMBLE. There are only two valid existing claims on the reservation, and those claimants are given new lands in place of those which they now occupy.

Mr. MALLORY. Is it provided that they shall have new lands in all cases?

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes, sir. There are other claims, but there are none of them that are considered valid. This is a Department measure; it was prepared by the Department, and they earnestly recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 15004) to authorize the Minneapolis, Superior, St. Paul and Winnipeg Railway Company, of Minnesota, to build and maintain a railway bridge across the Mississippi River.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 20, 1902, at 12 o'clock m.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FREEDMEN'S INQUIRY COMMISSION.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the views of the minority on the bill H. R. 12940, reported from the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to file the views of the minority on the bill H. R. 12940, the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12940) creating a commission to inquire into the condition of the colored people of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

JAMES W. LONG.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 282) providing for the appointment of James W. Long, late a captain of infantry, United States Army, and for placing his name on the retired list.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint James W. Long, late captain in the United States Army, a captain of infantry, and to thereupon place his name upon the unlimited retired list of the Army, in the class whose disabilities result from wounds received in battle.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I shall only take the time of the House for a moment for the purpose of referring to the military record of Maj. James W. Long, late a captain of the United States Army.

He was appointed a second lieutenant of the Second Infantry August 5, 1861. He was promoted to first lieutenant August 10, 1861; was brevetted captain June 27, 1862, for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Gaines Mill, Virginia, and major, May 5, 1864, for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of the Wilderness.

He was left out or unassigned on account of physical disability at the consolidation of the Second and Sixteenth Regiments of Infantry, under the act of March 3, 1869, reducing the Army. He was examined by a retiring board in September, 1870, and reported by the board to be not incapacitated for active service.

He was severely wounded at the battle of Gaines Mill June 27, 1862. His record of service reflects great credit upon him. He sustained severe and painful injuries, including the total loss of an eye and the impairment of the sight of the remaining eye as the direct result of his Army service. He has been a constant sufferer from his wounds; and there are very grave possibilities that he may be entirely deprived of his sight as a result thereof.

Under the authority conferred by the fourth section of the act of Congress, approved June 30, 1834, for the organization of the Department of Indian Affairs, the President of the United States was authorized to require any military officer to execute the duties of Indian agent, and in accordance with General Order No. 49, issued from the Headquarters of the Army, at Washington, May 7, 1869, Major Long was detailed for duty as agent for the Indians in the State of Michigan, achieving great success, making a most efficient and valuable aid to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. While he was absent on duty as Indian agent notice came from the Adjutant-General of the Army notifying him that he would be relieved from duty as an Indian agent, and to report his new address to the president of the retiring board, before whom he had been ordered to appear for examination. This notice, because of Major Long's absence on duty, did not reach him until six months after it was mailed, and during that time he had been practically legislated out of the Army.

He had been examined in 1869 by the Atlanta board and was found by that board to be unable to perform his duty as a soldier and with that finding should have been retired.

He has for many years endeavored to have the action of the retiring board corrected. His case is one of unusual merit. A letter from Gen. H. C. Corbin, Adjutant-General of the Army, under date of April 17 last, addressed to me, among other things, says:

I have the honor to say that in my opinion the bill for the relief of Major Long has exceptional merit, and I do not hesitate to express my own opinion that its passage would be just to the Government as well as to Major Long.

Every man who has examined his record with care reaches the same conclusion, that our action to-day would be a most tardy recognition of a most unfortunate soldier, who has merited the approbation of his Government and is deserving well at our hands. I express the sincere hope that there may be no difficulty in securing the enactment of this measure into law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, the other day when this bill was called up I objected to it, for the reason that I did not know anything about it. Since that time I have taken the trouble to investigate it, and my judgment is that if a meritorious case has been before this Congress, this is one of them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS ASHLEY RIVER, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. DAVIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14247) to authorize the Charleston, Suburban and Summerville Railway Company to construct and maintain two bridges across Ashley River, in the State of South Carolina.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS of Florida, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6104. An act to restore to the active list of the Navy the name of John Walton Ross.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9960) to prevent a false branding or marking of food and dairy products as to the State or Territory in which they are made or produced.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5718) providing for the sale of sites for manufacturing or industrial plants in the Indian Territory.

The message also announced that Mr. PROCTOR had been excused from the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 13676) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and that Mr. BURROWS had been appointed in his place.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 14019) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. MCMILLAN, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REPORT ON DISEASES OF THE HORSE.

Mr. TATE. By direction of the Committee on Printing, I ask unanimous consent that Senate concurrent resolution No. 47 be taken from the Speaker's table and considered now.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Committee on Enrolled Bills, in the enrollment of the joint resolution (S. R. 92) "providing for the publication of 50,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of the Horse," be authorized to correct the title thereof by striking out the words "fifty thousand" and inserting the words "two hundred thousand," so as to make the same correspond with the amendment of the House of Representatives to the said resolution, concurred in by the Senate.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution; and it was adopted.

On motion of Mr. TATE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. MERCER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) amending "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902, was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the law (Public, No. 146) entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902, be amended so as to transpose the provision for a United States post-office and court-house at Scranton, Pa., from section 4 to section 1; and the provisions, respectively, for the United States post-office at Moberly, Mo., for United States post-office at Columbia, Mo., and for the United States post-office and other governmental offices at Crookston, Minn., be transferred from section 4 to section 5 of said act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As I understand, this simply corrects an error in a bill already passed?

Mr. MERCER. It simply corrects an error made by the clerks in not enrolling the bill in accordance with the report of the conference committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It does not change the appropriation?

Mr. MERCER. Not at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It adds nothing whatever to the appropriations heretofore made for public buildings?

Mr. MERCER. No, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It simply corrects an error?

Mr. MERCER. That is all.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Upon motion of Mr. MERCER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

OSAGE RIVER, MISSOURI.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5906) declaring the Osage River to be not a navigable stream above the point where the line between the counties of Benton and St. Clair crosses said river.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Osage River in the State of Missouri, above the point where the dividing line between the counties of Benton and St. Clair crosses said river, is hereby declared not to be a navigable stream and shall be so treated by the Secretary of War and all other authorities.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DE ARMOND, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENTS IN LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. LOVERING. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1026) to fix the compensation of district superintendents in the Life-Saving Service.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of district superintendents in the Life-Saving Service shall be $2,000 per annum each: Provided, however, That in case the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary for any superintendent to employ a clerk, he may allow a sum not exceeding $500 per annum for the compensation of such clerk in addition to the salary paid the superintendent.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOVERING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5 strike out the words "$2,000 per annum each" and insert the words "as follows: For the superintendents of the first, second, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth districts, $2,000 per annum each; for the superintendents of the third and ninth districts, $1,800 per annum each; for the superintendent of the eighth district, $1,700."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOVERING, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REAL ESTATE FOR CUSTOMS PURPOSES AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. BELLAMY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14802) for the purchase of real estate, for revenue and customs purposes, at Wilmington, N. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, empowered and directed to cause an examination to be made of the wharf in front of the custom-house, and other property, at the port of Wilmington, N. C., known as the O. G. Parsley estate, offered by George D. Parsley and others of said city, namely, the following real estate: Lot 5, block 164, and all that part of lot 6, block 164, not now owned by the United States, and the two-story brick fireproof storehouse on said lot 6, fronting west 39 feet on Water street, running thence east 77.5 feet on Ewing's alley, abutting the United States bonded warehouse on the east and the United States custom-house on the south; the wharf front of said lots fronting on the Cape Fear River 104 feet, and also the easement of said Parsleys in the wharf front of lot 4, block 164, fronting the Cape Fear River 34 feet, and abutting said lot 5 on the north. And on inquiry as to their necessity for use for the Revenue-Cutter Service and other customs purposes at that port, and if it shall be found advantageous and necessary for such purposes, to purchase the same at a reasonable price: Provided, That it shall not exceed $16,000, which amount shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

After line 12, page 2, add the following:

"And provided, further, That the owners of said property shall accept such sum as may be agreed upon for the same in full of all rights, easements, etc., belonging thereto, including any claims and demands, legal or equitable, and all causes of action, legal or equitable, which they may have against the United States of said wharf or any part thereof, and all claims of any character, whether from tort, trespass, use and occupation, or otherwise."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CANNON. From what committee is it reported?

The SPEAKER. From the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. BELLAMY. If the gentleman wants any information about the bill I ask that the report be read.

Mr. CANNON. This is a proposition, as I understand, to buy $15,000 worth of property down there for revenue or customs purposes.

Mr. BELLAMY. I will explain the measure if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to know something about it.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Speaker, in the city of Wilmington, N. C., there is, of course, a custom-house owned by the Government. In front of that custom-house there is a wharf owned by the Parsley estate. On either side of that wharf the Government owns a wharf. For customs purposes there is needed on the north side of this property a building for storing in bond goods that may be imported into the port of Wilmington to be shipped beyond without appraisement, and for other customs purposes.

This building north of it and the wharf in front of it this bill gives to the Secretary of the Treasury discretion to buy, if in his judgment he sees fit, at a cost not exceeding $15,000. When the Spanish war broke out, the wharf in front of the custom-house, owned by the Parsley estate, was obstructed by the placing thereon of cannon, immense guns, that were sent down to the port of Wilmington to be conveyed to Fort Caswell, and which have since been erected on the fortifications at that fort. The owners of this private property claim damages out of the Government for the occupation of this wharf. These cannon not only laid there days, but weeks, and probably months. The revenue cutter stationed at that port, in being moored to its own wharf, which is not long enough to accommodate it, extends more than halfway across this Parsley wharf. The consequence is, the Government has been using this Parsley wharf for years, obstructing it, and the Parsley estate has been claiming damages from the Government, and I learn has employed lawyers here to sue it.

Now, in order to obtain this wharf for the Revenue-Cutter Service, and to obtain the building north of it for custom-house purposes, and to extinguish all claims against the Government by the Parsley estate, this bill allows the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase the Parsley property if, in his judgment, he deems it proper, provided the cost and the extinguishment of the claims shall not exceed $16,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, the gentleman need not make any further explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BELLAMY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LATE MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM J. SEWELL.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 100, authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for an equestrian statue of the late Maj. Gen. William J. Sewell, United States Volunteers, which I will ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to deliver to the governor of the State of New Jersey, at Trenton, N. J., if the same can be done without detriment to the public service, such condemned bronze cannon as he may deem proper, not to exceed 15,000 pounds in weight, to be used in the erection of an equestrian statue to the memory of the late Maj. Gen. William J. Sewell, United States Volunteers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which has just been read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on a third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PARKER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

OATH RESPECTING VESSEL REGISTRY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 11725) to amend section 4139 and section 4319 of the Revised Statutes with the Senate amendments.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio what these amendments are.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They simply authorize, in addition to the provisions of the House bill, that an officer of a corporation may make the affidavit if authorized to do so by power of attorney. That is the only addition to the bill as it was passed by the House.

Mr. CANNON. What branch of the service does it pertain to?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The merchant-marine branch. There is no additional expense or anything about it. It is merely to accommodate in swearing to certain papers connected with the register of the ship.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

ADELAIDE G. HATCH.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 8840) granting an increase of pension to John H. Lauchly, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee submits a conference report and statement to be printed in the RECORD. This will be done under the rule.

(For the conference report see RECORD of Senate proceedings of June 16.)

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

Managers on the part of the House.

SPANISH WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 3641, with Senate amendments, which bill is on the Speaker's table, and move concurrence in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. This will require unanimous consent of the House, as there are matters in the amendments which would require a vote of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GIBSON. Then I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the following House bill with Senate amendments:

The Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 3641) for the allowance of certain claims for property taken for military purposes within the United States during the war with Spain, reported by the Secretary of War in accordance with the requirements of an item contained in the sundry civil appropriation act, approved June 6, 1900, authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to investigate just claims against the United States for private property taken and used in the military service within the limits of the United States, etc., were read.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman if these additional claims have been passed on by the Department?

Mr. GIBSON. All reported favorably by the Secretary of War.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if this is a Senate bill with House amendments, or a House bill with Senate amendments?

Mr. GIBSON. This is a House bill with Senate amendments. It is the House bill to pay the awards made by the Secretary of War to certain individuals for property taken and used by the United States forces at the various encampments during the Spanish-American war.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Have these amendments been considered by the committee.

Mr. GIBSON. Considered by the House committee; yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The bill has been before the War Claims Committee?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has that committee considered and favorably reported the Senate amendments?

Mr. GIBSON. The chairman of the committee and myself, after informal consultation with other members, have agreed that the amendments are all right, having been found by the Secretary of War in pursuance of the act of Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman if he has consulted the minority members of that committee?

Mr. GIBSON. I have not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Subsequently,

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama withdraws his objection to unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws his objection to the bill recently called up by the gentleman from Tennessee. Is there further objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire about the amendment in reference to the claim, on page 5, of W. A. Huff. As I understood by the reading from the desk the Senate struck that provision out.

Mr. GIBSON. That was stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The question was taken; and the Senate amendments were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. GIBSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

BEQUESTS FOR USES OF RELIGIOUS, CHARITABLE, AND EDUCATIONAL CHARACTER.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call up the bill H. R. 13204, with Senate amendments, and have them read to the House, after which I will make a request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the bill, which the Clerk will report, with Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13204) to provide for refunding taxes paid upon legacies and bequests for uses of a religious, charitable, or educational character, for the encouragement of art, etc., under the act of June 13, 1898.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, these amendments of the Senate were fully considered by the Committee on Ways and Means yesterday, informally, of course, because the bill had not been referred to the committee; and I was directed unanimously by the committee to ask unanimous consent of the House to consider the amendments in the House, and to concur in the amendments. Possibly I ought to state briefly, in explanation to the House, that the first Senate amendment, section 2, in the bill, is a refund of sums paid for documentary stamps used on the export bills of lading. The original war-revenue tax provided for a small stamp to be placed on export bills of lading. The question was brought before the courts, and the Supreme Court decided that that portion of the law was unconstitutional, and that we had no right to impose those taxes. Therefore we are liable to refund the amounts paid. It is a small sum—amounting to three or four thousand dollars.

The third section, which is the second amendment of the Senate, as numbered, provides for a refund of the tax collected on contingent beneficiary interest in legacies taxed by the law, and also repeals it upon any future contingent beneficiary interest after the 1st of July. The Internal-Revenue Commissioner has lately decided that the tax under the law must be exacted on contingent beneficiary interests although they take effect on the 1st of July and become vested after that date. As we have repealed all these legacy taxes, the committee thought it fair and just to repeal this part of it, and not to require those who receive legacies which are to be paid after the 1st of July—some of them twenty and thirty years from now—to be taxed on those legacies, and not to require trustees and executors to pay such tax.

The third proposition added by the Senate is that taxes which shall have accrued before the taking effect of the act of April 12, 1902, and since the act of July 1, 1900, upon securities delivered or transferred to secure future payments of money are hereby remitted. When the law was first in force, we did not exact any tax upon transfer of stock made as security for a loan. We did not intend to tax a loan twice, once on the note and again on the security; and this is simply to repeal that part of the tax, none of which has ever been collected, but about which litigation has been instituted. I move to concur.

The SPEAKER. This is a House bill with Senate amendments.

Is there objection to taking it from the Speaker's table for consideration now? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were concurred in.

Mr. PAYNE. There is an amendment to the title. I do not know whether that will follow.

The SPEAKER. That will go with the rest of it.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were agreed to was laid on the table.

MONUMENT TO THE MEMORY OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate bill, with House amendment, disagreed to by the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5269) to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a monument or a memorial to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following conferees: Mr. McCLEARY, Mr. McCALL, and Mr. WOOTEN.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS IN THE STATE OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks for the regular order, which is the unfinished business from last night's session, being Senate bill No. 4284, pending with a committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the Clerk will report to the House, and then there is an amendment pending to that, the Chair understands.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested, as there were not many members present last night, that unanimous consent be asked for ten minutes, five minutes a side, this morning. Personally I have no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments, after which the gentleman can make the request.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, strike out, in line 10, the words "only by separate sealed bids" and substitute therefor the words "at public auction to the highest bidder." At the end of line 16, page 16, strike out the word "seal."

The SPEAKER. This is an amendment to the substitute, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we be allowed ten minutes to have that explained.

The SPEAKER. To whom is the time to be given?

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that five minutes be controlled by those in favor of the amendment and five minutes by those against—the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked that ten minutes be given to debate on this amendment, five minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY] and five minutes by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, as I stated last night in the discussion of this matter, this is an amendment to what is known as the Nelson law of 1889, relating to the ceded portion of the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, and particularly relating to the sale of the pine timber therefrom.

The principal change, or one of the principal changes in this amendment to that bill, is the change in the manner of the disposition of the timber. Under the law of 1889 this timber was sold at public auction, upon estimates made by what we term "cruisers," or estimators of the timber in the tree. It has been stated that scandal arose from the operation of that law. That is true. It has been further stated that scandal arose as to the manner of the sale, which is not accurate. The whole scandal arose from the scaling under the estimate, which was based upon the incompetency of the estimators. These estimators were appointed as a matter of politics, and in many instances were incompetent men, and the timber was very greatly underestimated, and all the scandal arose out of the sale of the timber, coming from the fact that the timber was underestimated, and not because of the manner of its sale.

In this bill it provides for the selling of the timber under sealed bids instead of at public auction, and my amendment which I have offered strikes out the sealed-bid proposition and substitutes "at open public sale thereof." As I stated last night, the Department of the Interior is very much opposed to my amendment. I think it is due to the House to say that the majority of the Indian Committee reported adversely to this amendment and refused to offer it as a committee amendment. The reasons urged by the Interior Department in favor of sealed bids lay in the fact that they claim it would prevent collusion on the part of the bidders. That was the sole and only reason offered.

I desire to state that when these bills were introduced, both containing a proposition for open bids, that it was changed at the request of the Secretary of the Interior. More than that, the Secretary of the Interior made it a condition precedent that he would not recommend, and his Department would not recommend, the passage of this bill unless it contained that provision. It was virtually and practically a legislative hold-up.

Now, I desire a moment to examine the reason offered by the Secretary of the Interior. I would like to have some person in this House—and I put this same query last night—to explain under what circumstances a collusion could not be formed as well under a secret bid as it could upon a public auction. Collusion could be formed in both cases. The only difference would be that if a collusion was formed under a sealed bid it would forever remain secret. If a collusion was formed at an open and public sale everybody would be aware of that collusion. There is another reason why I am in favor of an open public sale, and that is because it absolutely precludes the possibility of a man raising his own bid.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more. This is a very important matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for another five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the same concession on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDDY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I claim in the sale of Government property that a man has a right to know at the time of the sale what every other man does at the same time. The parties in whom I am interested with regard to this matter are the small loggers and the small operators. As I have stated before, this timber is surrounded by settlements of small farmers who want to go in and buy a small tract, put up a portable mill, and manufacture lumber for themselves and for their neighbors. The small loggers—men owning a few teams, hiring a few men—desire to go in there and purchase small tracts of timber and operate on their own account and sell the logs they take off to the lumber concerns without being obliged to work for wages for the large lumber corporations.

Now, under the provision of sealed bids, these men are practically shut out, because, if they should desire to bid, say, $9 a thousand for a 40-acre tract, some one comes in under a sealed bid and bids $10 a thousand. They would have no opportunity to raise their bid, while if the matter was open and public they would have the opportunity to raise their own bid and they might bid as high as $15 a thousand. This sealed-bid proposition is a radical departure from the practice of the Government in all similar instances of this kind. In every bill that passed at the evening session, wherever there was a disposition of Government property it was always at public auction. I submit it as a fair business proposition to the business men of this House that if a man has property to dispose of and wishes to dispose of it at auction he would not call for sealed bids. I claim that every governmental transaction should be open to all the people of the country; that there should be no sealed transactions on the part of the Government.

The Secretary of the Interior, in a letter which he volunteers to send to this House—a sort of special message on the part of the Secretary of the Interior—stated that in all probability opportunity would be given to the newspaper correspondents and all people interested to examine these bids. Now, I do not know but that such will be the case; but there is nothing in the bill requiring any such procedure on the part of the Interior Department. I have had some experience myself in handling and selling pine timber. I believe that those logs sold at public auction will bring a better price for the Indians, and the sale generally will give more satisfaction than if it were carried on under sealed bids. In this opinion I have the concurrence of a very large majority of the Minnesota delegation. As I stated before, when these bills were originally introduced they contained a provision requiring sale at public auction. In the proposition I now submit I have the concurrence of a very large majority of the people of Minnesota who live in the vicinity of this timber. I submit to the House that on a matter that is entirely within the boundaries of Minnesota the delegation from that State and the people of the State are better judges as to the proper manner of disposing of the question than the Secretary of the Interior or any outside parties who have had no practical experience upon the subject.

Mr. LACEY. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY] will be voted down. The committee carefully considered this question. An amendment of this kind was offered upon two different occasions in the Committee on Indian Affairs and was voted down. The amendment is objectionable to the Department, which must dispose of this timber, and therefore I hope the House will vote against the amendment.

Mr. LACEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment will not prevail. I can easily understand how the constituents of the gentleman from Minnesota may be desirous to have a public auction in Minnesota at the place where the land is located, involving some 250,000 acres by actual measurement, because the bidders in Minnesota would of course have a much better opportunity than bidders from other States.

And then, Mr. Speaker, I believe that if such a proceeding were encouraged (which is not part of the programme of the gentleman from Minnesota), the bidders would have a much better opportunity to form a "ring," and there would be more confusion, and a less price would be realized for the lumber.

On the other hand, if the recommendation of the committee be adopted and these proposals are sent in, they can be sent from any part of the United States, and every bidder who wants to buy the lumber will name his highest possible price, hoping that his bid will be successful. Therefore I hope that the amendment will be adopted and the recommendation of the committee as embodied in the bill will stand.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the source of the objection to sealed bids ought to be conclusive as to the propriety of having such bids. I do not refer to the gentleman who makes the motion, but the persons who have been urging that we do not have such bids. My friend from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY], in the hearing on this matter before the committee, made this statement at a time when the lumbermen of Minnesota had not been urging open bids:

I would have him—

The Secretary of the Interior—

confer these contracts on the highest bidders on sealed bids, reserving the right to reject any and all bids.

The sale under sealed bids, I think, will undoubtedly result in obtaining the highest price for the timber. We are the guardians of those Indians; we are providing for the sale of their property. There is nothing to prevent a St. Paul or Minneapolis man from bidding just as high as he thinks he can afford to go on a sealed bid. But if we have open bids there will be combinations; the persons expecting to bid will meet at a hotel, or elsewhere, make an arrangement among themselves, and two or three persons will do the bidding, and after the contract is awarded the parties will divide it up among them. This can not be done if the sealed bids be adopted, for in that case somebody may put in a bid that nobody else knows anything about; it is not possible under that system to include every bidder in a combination.

Now, I will ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ZENOR], who is a member of the committee and who has examined this matter with care, whether he thinks it would be safe to leave this property to be disposed of on open bids?

Mr. ZENOR. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], I will say that it was the general conclusion of the committee that it would be better, both for the Government and for the Indians, that the sale should be by public auction under sealed bids; and I think it would be detrimental to an advantageous sale of the timber if the sale were conducted otherwise.

Mr. LACEY. It was the earnest request of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and also of the Secretary of the Interior, that the system of sealed bids be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of scandal about timber on these reservations. Here are millions of dollars' worth of timber to be sold. The highest price ever realized there, I believe, up to date, has been $2.40 per thousand. We start here with the proposition of making $4 and $5 the minimum price.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand what the gentleman said was the highest price received up to to-day. The minimum price is $3.

Mr. LACEY. The sale of dead and down timber I have been told—perhaps I have been misinformed——

Mr. EDDY. That is a different proposition.

Mr. LACEY. Has been at $2.40 a thousand, and this proposition is $4 and $5 a thousand as a minimum, with the opportunity for the whole world to bid on the property.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman speaks of a combination. I will ask the gentleman if he would be willing to put a proviso in the bill that in such an event the party selling should——

Mr. LACEY. You are never going to prove anything about such event. How are you going to prove a combination except by the results? By having the sale under sealed bids no combination can be made, because they will never know when they have got the last man into the combination. We have sealed bids for the construction of railroads and public buildings in order to get the lowest bid. It is open to the world in this case. Anybody who wants to bid under this law can do it, and the sealed bids will absolutely prevent a combination. Gentlemen have been urging for open bids who want to buy the timber as cheap as possible, and yet they argue that the timber will bring a higher price on open bids than upon sealed bids. If they thought they could get it cheaper by sealed than by open bids, I imagine that they would naturally oppose the open-bid method, and yet we find these dealers at Minneapolis and St. Paul urgently insisting upon sealed bids.

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, I have no wish to charge the gentleman from Iowa with any misrepresentation, but I desire to state that he is mistaken in that statement. The buyers are divided on the question.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask my friend if in the hearing before the committee he did not make the statement that, in his opinion, we ought to have sealed bids?

Mr. EDDY. I did. The reason of that——

Mr. LACEY. And has not the gentleman been importuned to change his views on this question and to make this motion?

Mr. EDDY. I have.

Mr. LACEY. By men who are wanting to buy the property?

Mr. EDDY. I want to state further now——

Mr. LACEY. I can not yield more time to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to further yield.

Mr. LACEY. I accept the good faith of my friend. His change of mind followed the intercession of his constituents who, I think, were probably wanting to bid. At first he was in favor of sealed bids. I believe he was right then and I believe the motion made now is against the interests of the Indians, and I hope it will be voted down. If this amendment is put upon the bill, I hope the bill will fail, because I believe it would result in unfair treatment of the Indians who own the timber, but I do not think that this amendment providing for open bids will be adopted against the protest of the Indian Commissioner, the Secretary of the Interior, and the majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who have no purpose in the world except to do that which was just to these Indians who owned the property and who are entitled to its proceeds.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire in what way the open bids would be unjust to the Indians?

Mr. LACEY. In this: The open bidders would meet at the time and the place of the sale. They would organize a syndicate. Instead of there being 50 bidders when the auction commences, there would be only three, or some other small number, and they would fix the price then and there and divide the stumpage among themselves afterwards. They can not do that under sealed bids. Somebody from Mississippi or Massachusetts will send in bids and it is impossible to organize a combination of that kind unless there is open bidding, by which all the persons who are trying to get the property have an opportunity to compare bids and make a combination on the spot, at the time of the sale.

Mr. CANDLER. Does the provision of the bill authorize the rejection of any and all bids, when you make the sale by sealed bids, or is their acceptance compulsory, compelling you to take the highest bid?

Mr. LACEY. I am not sure as to that. I think so.

Mr. CURTIS. It reserves the right to reject any and all bids.

Mr. LACEY. The right to reject any and all bids is reserved. That will insure fair treatment to the Indians, and it is the only method that will insure it. Open bids with a public auction will do precisely the opposite, and result in a combination. Now, I believe that is all I care to say upon this proposition, unless some gentleman has a question to ask.

Mr. RUMPLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. LACEY. I yield to my colleague, Mr. RUMPLE.

Mr. RUMPLE. Is there anything in this bill that requires the manufacture of this timber in the forest?

Mr. LACEY. It is permitted, not required. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What has been the custom heretofore?

Mr. LACEY. Unfortunately, most of the sales have been at auction.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The parliamentary situation is this: At last night's session an amendment by way of a substitute was offered to the bill. To that an amendment was agreed to, and to the substitute still pending the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY] offered an amendment, which has been reported by the Clerk. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY].

The question being taken (on a division demanded by Mr. EDDY) there were—ayes 9, noes 87.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE, EVENING SESSION.

The SPEAKER designated Mr. CURRIER as Speaker pro tempore for the evening session.

OATH RESPECTING VESSEL REGISTRY.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I omitted to move to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 11725) to amend section 4139 and section 4314 of the Revised Statutes. I now make that motion, and move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the consideration of Senate bill 2295, temporarily to provide for the administration of affairs in the Philippines: and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that I, as chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, be permitted to control the time upon this side and that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] be permitted to control the time upon the other side during the debate. We had that understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], in pursuance of the order of the House, moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the consideration of Senate bill 2295, known as the Philippine government bill; and pending that, asks unanimous consent that he, as chairman of the committee, be permitted to control one half of the time, and that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], a member of that committee, be permitted to control the other half. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry before that request is put. Under that order, if the House makes it, the time on this side will be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] in general debate, and no gentleman will be permitted to speak who does not get time from him. Will that be the situation?

The SPEAKER. Absolutely. That will be the order of the House if it is given; and the Chair will further state, so that there will be no misunderstanding, that it will also control the general debate at the evening sessions. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2295, the Philippine government bill, with Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAPRON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. B. MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BURKETT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 200. Joint resolution amending "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4923) to ratify and confirm a supplemental agreement with the Creek tribe of Indians, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a full and free conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. FORAKER, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The committee resumed its session.

[Mr. JONES of Virginia addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield for a motion? I desire to move that the committee do now rise, and I am going to ask to vacate the order as far as the night session to-night is concerned. I presume the gentleman has nobody to proceed on that side, and nobody is ready on this side.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Very well, Mr. Chairman; I yield for that motion.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2295, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the order of the House, so far as the session of to-night is concerned, be vacated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that so much of the order affecting this bill as relates to a session for this evening, and this evening only, be vacated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ACCOUNTS OF LOUISIANA EXPOSITION COMPANY.

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State covering a statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company for the month of December, 1901, furnished by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Commission in pursuance of section 11 of the "act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana Territory," etc., approved March 3, 1901.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to say that the report submitted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] is the report of the majority of the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3112) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to determine the claims of the confederated bands of Ute Indians of Colorado, reported it with an amendment.

MONUMENT TO GEN. HUGH MERCER.

Mr. WETMORE. I am directed by the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10933) to provide for the erection, at Fredericksburg, Va., of the monument to the memory of Gen. Hugh Mercer, which it was ordered by Congress on the 8th day of April, 1777, should be erected, to report it favorably with an amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask for the present consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Rhode Island. I think it will occupy but a few moments of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator who reported that bill if I understand it correctly as making an appropriation from the public Treasury for the erection of this monument.

Mr. WETMORE. It does. It appropriates $25,000. There are plenty of precedents.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator says that there are plenty of precedents. That may be so. There are precedents for pretty much everything. But I want to say that if this bill passes a great many other bills of a similar character will appear in Congress, and if one is favored I do not see upon what hypothesis the others can be denied.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, this is the execution of a resolution of Congress which was passed in April, 1777. General Mercer was killed while leading the advance of the American troops at Princeton. He was an officer of great distinction and great merit. He had served through the Indian wars, and greatly distinguished himself at Long Island and other places in the Revolution.

The estimate of the country of his services was such that Congress, in April of that year, he having been mortally wounded at Princeton on the 3d of January, provided that this monument should be built to his memory.

Time and again the matter has had the attention of Congress. This time the bill has passed the House of Representatives without objection, and it seems to me that it is an obligation of honor on the part of the Government to fulfill the decree which it then entered in ordering this testimonial to his memory.

I hope the Senator will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, ever since I have been in public life I have been endeavoring to get an appropriation from Congress for a monument to the memory of John Stark, who is buried in an obscure place on the banks of the Merrimac River. The State of New Hampshire has honored him by erecting a statue to his memory in the statehouse park at Concord. In connection with my efforts I have been met with the suggestion over and over again that we are not engaged in the business of erecting monuments outside of the city of Washington.

At the present session I introduced a joint resolution providing for a pittance of $2,000 for the erection, not exactly of a monument, perhaps, but something commemorative in the town of Peterboro, N. H., of the services of General James Miller, who greatly distinguished himself at Lundys Lane, and who was a very conspicuous military character during the war of 1812; but it has not been reported, and I take it that it will not be reported to the Senate. I am in receipt of numerous letters concerning that particular appropriation, which is very insignificant in amount, but I have felt constrained to reply that I see little hope of a favorable recommendation.

Now, I do not know much about this particular case. Of course I have to accept everything my friend from Virginia says about General Mercer's career, and I assume that what he says is correct—that in the early days some action in regard to this matter was taken by the Continental Congress. I do not want to unnecessarily obstruct a matter of this kind, but I do feel like warning the Senate that it will be one more precedent, and that some of us in the future will be even more persistent than we have been in the past in asking that monuments shall be provided for men like General Stark, whose career certainly was equal in military prowess and in importance for the independence of the colonies to that of any other man who participated in the battles of the Revolution. Bunker Hill and Bennington are his jewels, and without Bunker Hill the battle of Princeton might never have been fought.

Mr. President, I will not object to the consideration of this bill, but I want to sound a note of warning that other similar bills will be pressed in the future with greater persistency than they have been in the past if this measure becomes a law. If we appropriate money to erect this monument, there is no valid reason why similar monuments shall not be erected to all the other great heroes of the Revolutionary period.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. The bill is not before the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Others having been indulged; may I ask what the bill is?

The bill was again read by title.

Mr. HOAR. The word "it" should be stricken out.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I trust I may be indulged for just a word.

In the Continental Congress an act was passed providing monuments for ten generals of the Revolutionary army at $500 apiece. It was never carried out. One of those generals was Gen. David Worcester, of Connecticut, who distinguished himself greatly.

If these appropriations are to be made by Congress to carry out what was the action of the Continental Congress, all the generals ought to be treated alike. We have passed bills here, two, I think—one was for a monument in North Carolina; I do not remember the name of the general—appropriating $5,000. They have never got through the House. This bill provides for an appropriation of $25,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has passed the House.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And it has passed the House.

Mr. President, if there is to be a $25,000 monument erected to General Mercer because the Continental Congress included him among ten generals to whom monuments were to be erected at $500 apiece, I want to amend the bill so as to provide for a monument to General Worcester.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I rise to make a conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa presents a conference report, which will be read.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me to make a privileged motion?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield until I ask unanimous consent before the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island is submitted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has just yielded to the Senator from Rhode Island.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL APPALACHIAN FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to ask unanimous consent, in view of the motion which has just been adopted, that the bill (S. 5228) for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, to be known as the National Appalachian Forest Reserve, shall be taken up for consideration on Monday next, after the routine morning business, not to interfere with conference reports or appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. What the Senator wants, I take it, is simply to substitute Monday for Saturday, as we have adjourned over. It is not a new thing.

Mr. ALDRICH. With the same limitations, making the order for Monday.

Mr. HALE. Substituting Monday for Saturday.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want any unanimous-consent agreement that will put out of its place the consideration of the Choctaw treaty. Its passage has become very important in the allotment of lands and the settlement of affairs in the Indian Territory. The Department is very anxious to have the bill passed. There was a unanimous-consent agreement to take it up this morning, and if we can not get through with it to-day I do not want to be cut off. If the Senator from Kansas will except that bill from the unanimous-consent agreement, in case we do not get rid of it to-day, all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to by him, having the right to-morrow by unanimous consent, shall receive consideration on Monday, in the morning hour, not to interfere with conference reports or appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLISON. That it shall have the same relation on Monday that it would have to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That it shall have the same right on Monday it has for to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. I object, for this reason: Probably I am in error in objecting, but I have a motion which will probably come before the Senate on Monday in relation to the admission to statehood of the three Territories, which I do not desire to have shoved aside to give way for this other business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Senator from Iowa presents a conference report, which will be read.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I make the request for Tuesday, if I can not get an agreement for Monday.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senate will agree to this request. It is rather hard on the Senator from Kansas, where his ground is taken away from him by the adjournment over to-morrow and by other matters coming in. I hope the Senator will be allowed to have the bill transferred to Tuesday morning with the same rights that it had for to-morrow. That is evidently fair. We have cut down his ground.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks that the rights already granted may be yielded to the bill to which he refers on Tuesday morning next after the routine business is completed. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. I object for the present. I wish to inquire what are the rights already granted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent was given to proceed to-morrow morning to the consideration of the bill to which the Senator from Kansas has referred.

Mr. QUAY. I objected to that.

Mr. HALE. That agreement had already been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania did not object to that agreement.

Mr. HALE. That was for Saturday.

Mr. QUAY. When was it made?

Mr. HALE. Last week some time.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to object unless I know what rights this bill is going to have.

Mr. ALDRICH. I see that the suggestion which I offered at the time this agreement was made in the Senate, that it should apply to only one day, is not included in the printed agreement on the Calendar.

Mr. BURTON. That was the agreement, as the Senator from Rhode Island says, and a longer time will not be insisted upon at all. It is to occupy the place only for that morning.

Mr. TELLER. Then I do not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. QUAY. I should like to understand distinctly the condition of affairs for Monday.

Mr. HALE. We have not touched Monday.

Mr. ALLISON. Nothing has been done about Monday.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Pennsylvania will have Monday.

Mr. QUAY. This agreement does not affect Monday?

Mr. ALLISON and others. No.

Mr. QUAY. I withdraw the request for information.
